State, for the unexpired term occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. BEDFORD BROWN, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. FULTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the House of Representatives, informing that body that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that they are ready to proceed to business.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that a quorum of that body was assembled, and were ready to proceed to business.

A message was also received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had passed the following joint resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and that Congress is now ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana offered the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, and were ready to receive any communications he might be pleased to make, reported that they had performed that duty, and that the President had replied that he would immediately make a communication to them in writing.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

The following message from the President of the United States was received by Mr. VAN BUREN, his Private Secretary:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Our devout gratitude is due to the Supreme Being for having graciously continued to our beloved country, through the vicissitudes of another year, the invaluable blessings of health, plenty, and peace. Seldom has this favored land been so generally exempted from the ravages of disease, or the labor of the husbandman more amply rewarded; and never before have our relations with other countries been placed on a more favorable basis than that which they so happily occupy at this critical conjuncture in the affairs of the world. A rigid and persevering abstinence from all interference with the domestic and political relations of other States, alike due to the genius and distinctive character of our Government and to the principles by which it is directed; a faithful observance, in the management of our foreign relations, of the practice of speaking plainly, dealing justly, and requiring truth and justice in return, as the best conservatives of the peace of nations; a strict impartiality in our manifestations of friendship, in the commercial privileges we concede, and those we require from others: these, accompanied by a disposition as prompt to maintain, in every emergency, our own rights, as we rea from principle averse to the invasion of those of others, have given to our country and Government a standing in the great family of nations, of which we have just cause to be proud, and the advantages of which are experienced by our citizens throughout every portion of the earth to which their enterprising and adventurous spirit may carry them. Few, if any, remain insensible to the value of our friendship, or ignorant of the terms on which it can be acquired, and by which it can alone be preserved.

A series of questions of long standing, difficult in their adjustment, and important in their consequences, in which the rights of our citizens and the honor of the country were deeply involved, have, in the course of a few years, (the most of them during the successful administration of my immediate predecessor,) been brought to a satisfactory conclusion; and the most important of those remaining are, I am happy to believe, in a fair way of being speedily and satisfactorily adjusted.

With all the powers of the world our relations are those of honorable peace. Since your adjournment, nothing serious has occurred to interrupt or threaten this desirable harmony. If clouds have lowered above the other hemisphere, they have not cast their portentous shadows upon our happy shores. Bound by no entangling alliances, yet linked by a common nature and interest with the other nations of mankind, our aspirations are for the preservation of peace, in whose solid and civilizing triumphs all may participate with a generous emulation. Yet it behooves us to be prepared for any event, and to be always ready to maintain those just and enlightened principles of national intercourse, for which this Government has ever contended. In the shock of contending empires, it is only by assuming a resolute bearing, and clothing themselves with defensive armor, that neutral nations can maintain their independent rights.

The excitement which grew out of the territorial controversy between the United States and Great Britain having in a great measure subsided, it is hoped that a favorable period is approaching for its final settlement. Both Governments must now be convinced of the dangers with which the question is fraught; and it must be their desire, as it is their interest, that this perpetual cause of irritation should be removed as speedily as practicable. In my last annual message you were informed that the proposition for a commission of exploration and survey promised by Great Britain had been received, and that a counter project, including also a provision for the certain and final adjustment of the limits in dispute, was then before the British Government for its consideration. The answer of that Government, accompanied by additional propositions of its own, was received, through its minister here, since your separation. These were promptly considered; such as were deemed correct in principle, and consistent with a due regard to the just rights of the United States and of the State of Maine, concurred in; and the reasons for dissenting from the residue, with an additional suggestion on our part, communicated by the Secretary of State to Mr. Fox. That Minister, not feeling himself sufficiently instructed upon some of the points raised in the discussion, felt it to be his duty to refer the matter to his own Government for its further decision. Having now been for some time under its advisement, a speedy answer may be confidently expected. From the character of the points still in difference, and the undoubted disposition of both parties to bring the matter to an early conclusion, I look with entire confidence to a prompt and satisfactory termination of the negotiation. Three commissioners were appointed shortly after the adjournment of Congress, under the act of the last session providing for the exploration and survey of the line which separates the States of Maine and New Hampshire from the British Provinces; they have been actively employed until their progress was interrupted by the inclemency of the season, and will resume their labors as soon as practicable in the ensuing year.

It is understood that their respective examinations will throw new light upon the subject in controversy, and serve to remove any erroneous impressions which may have been made elsewhere prejudicial to the rights of the United States. It was, among other reasons, with a view of preventing the embarrassments which, in our peculiar system of government, impede and complicate negotiations involving the territorial rights of a State, that I thought it my duty, as you have been informed on a previous occasion, to propose to the British Government, through its Minister at Washington, that early steps should be taken to adjust the points of difference on the line of boundary from the entrance of Lake Superior to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, by the arbitration of a friendly power, in conformity with the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent. No answer has yet been returned by the British Government to this proposition.

With Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, and the remaining powers of Europe, I am happy to inform you our relations continue to be of the most friendly character. With Belgium, a treaty of commerce and navigation, based upon liberal principles of reciprocity and equality, was concluded in March last, and having been ratified by the Belgian Government, will be duly laid before the Senate. It is a subject of congratulation that it provides for the satisfactory adjustment of a long standing question of controversy, thus removing the only obstacle which could obstruct the friendly and mutually advantageous intercourse between the two nations. A messenger has been despatched with the Hanoverian treaty to Berlin, where, according to stipulation, the ratifications are to be exchanged. I am happy to announce to you that, after many delays and difficulties, a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and Portugal, was concluded and signed at Lisbon on the 26th of August last, by the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments. Its stipulations are founded upon those principles of mutual liberality and advantage which the United States have always sought to make the basis of their intercourse with foreign powers; and it is hoped they will tend to foster and strengthen the commercial intercourse of the two countries.

Under the appropriation of the last session of Congress, an agent has been sent to Germany, for the purpose of promoting the interests of our tobacco trade.

The commissioners appointed under the convention for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States upon Mexico having met and organized at Washington, in August last, the papers in the possession of the Government, relating to those claims, were communicated to the board. The claims not embraced by that convention are now the subject of negotiation between the two Governments, through the medium of our Minister at Mexico.

Nothing has occurred to disturb the harmony of our relations with the different Governments of South America. I regret, however, to be obliged to inform you that the claims of our citizens upon the late Republic of Colombia have not yet been satisfied by the separate Governments into which it has been resolved.

The Charge d'Affaires at Brazil having expressed the intention of his Government not to prolong the treaty of 1823, it will cease to be obligatory upon either party on the 12th day of December, 1841, when the extensive commercial intercourse between the United States and that vast empire will no longer be regulated by express stipulations.

It affords me pleasure to communicate to you that the Government of Chili has entered into an agreement to indemnify the claimants in the case of the Macedonian, for American property seized in 1819; and to add, that information has also been received which justifies the hope of an early adjustment of the remaining claims upon that Government.

The commissioners appointed in pursuance of the convention between the United States and Texas, for marking the boundary between them, have, according to the last report received from our commissioner, surveyed and established the whole extent of boundary north along the western bank of the Sabine river, from its entrance into the Gulf of Mexico to the thirty-second degree of north latitude. The commission adjourned on the 16th of June last, to reassemble on the 1st of November, for the purpose of establishing accurately the intersection of the thirty-second degree of latitude with the western bank of the Sabine, and the meridian line thence to Red river. It is presumed that the work will be concluded in the present season.

The present sound condition of their finances, and the success with which embarrassments in regard to them, at times apparently insurmountable, have been overcome, are matters upon which the people and the Government of the United States may well congratulate themselves. An overflowing Treasury, however it may be regarded as an evidence of public prosperity, is seldom conducive to the permanent welfare of any people; and experience has demonstrated its incompatibility with the salutary action of political institutions like those of the United States. Our safest reliance for financial efficiency and independence has, on the contrary, been found to exist in ample resources unencumbered with debt; and, in this respect, the Federal Government occupies a singularly fortunate and truly enviable position.

When I entered upon the discharge of my official duties in March, 1837, the act for the distribution of the surplus revenue was in a course of rapid execution. Nearly twenty-eight millions of dollars of the public moneys were, in pursuance of its provisions, deposited with the States in the months of January, April, and July, of that year. In May there occurred a general suspension of specie payments by the banks, including, with very few exceptions, those in which the public moneys were deposited, and upon whose fidelity the Government had unfortunately made itself dependent for the revenues which had been collected from the people, and were indispensable to the public service. This suspension, and the excesses in banking and commerce out of which it arose, and which were greatly aggravated by its occurrence, made, to a great extent, unavailable the principal part of the public money then on hand; suspended the collection of many millions accruing on merchants' bonds, and greatly reduced the revenue arising from customs and the public lands. These effects have continued to operate, in various degrees, to the present period; and, in addition to the decrease in the revenue thus produced, two and a half millions of duties have been relinquished by two biennial reductions under the act of 1833, and probably as much more upon the importation of iron for railroads, by special legislation.

Whilst such has been our condition for the last four years in relation to revenue, we have, during the same period, been subjected to an unavoidable continuance of large extraordinary expenses necessarily growing out of past transactions, and which could not be immediately arrested without great prejudice to the public interest. Of these, the charge upon the Treasury, in consequence of the Cherokee treaty alone, without adverting to others arising out of Indian treaties, has already exceeded five millions of dollars; that for the prosecution of measures for the removal of the Seminole Indians, which were found in progress, has been nearly fourteen millions; and the public buildings have required the unusual sum of nearly three millions.

It affords me, however, great pleasure to be able to say, that, from the commencement of this period to the present day, every demand upon the Government, at home or abroad, has been promptly met. This has been done, not only without creating a permanent debt, or a resort to additional taxation in any form, but in the midst of a steadily progressive reduction of existing burdens upon the people, leaving still a considerable balance of available funds which will remain in the Treasury at the end of the year. The small amount of Treasury notes, not exceeding four and a half millions of dollars, still outstanding, and less by twenty-three millions than the United States have in deposit with the States, is composed of such only as are not yet due, or have not been presented for payment. They may be redeemed out of the accruing revenue, if the expenditures do not exceed the amount within which they may, it is thought, be kept without prejudice to the public interest, and the revenue shall prove to be as large as may justly be anticipated.

Among the reflections arising from the contemplation of these circumstances, one, not the least gratifying, is the consciousness that the Government had the resolution and the ability to adhere, in every emergency, to the sacred obligations of law; to execute all its contracts according to the requirements of the Constitution, and thus to present, when most needed, a rallying point by which the business of the whole country might be brought back to a safe and unvarying standard—a result vitally important as well to the interests as to the morals of the people. There can surely now be no difference of opinion in regard to the incalculable evils that would have arisen if the Government, at that critical moment, had suffered itself to be deterred from upholding the only true standard of value, either by the pressure of adverse circumstances or the violence of unmerited denunciation. The manner in which the people sustained the performance of this duty was highly honorable to their fortitude and patriotism. It cannot fail to stimulate their agents to adhere, under all circumstances, to the line of duty; and to satisfy them of the safety with which a course really right, and demanded by a financial crisis, may, in a community like ours, be pursued, however apparently severe its immediate operation.

The policy of the Federal Government, in extinguishing as rapidly as possible the national debt, and, subsequently, in resisting every temptation to create a new one, deserves to be regarded in the same favorable light. Among the many objections to a national debt, the certain tendency of public securities to concentrate ultimately in the coffers of foreign stockholders, is one which is every day gathering strength. Already have the resources of many of the States, and the future industry of their citizens, been indefinitely mortgaged to the subjects of European Governments, to the amount of twelve millions annually, to pay the constantly accruing interest on borrowed money—a sum exceeding half the ordinary revenues of the whole United States. The pretext which this relation affords to foreigners to scrutinize the management of our domestic affairs, if not actually to intermeddle with them, presents a subject for earnest attention, not to say of serious alarm. Fortunately, the Federal Government, with the exception of an obligation entered into in behalf of the District of Columbia, which must soon be discharged, is wholly exempt from any such embarrassment. It is also, as is believed, the only Government which, having fully and faithfully paid all its creditors, has also relieved itself entirely from debt. To maintain a distinction so desirable, and so honorable to our national character, should be an object of earnest solicitude. Never should a free people, if it be possible to avoid it, expose themselves to the necessity of having to treat of the peace, the honor, or the safety of the Republic, with the Governments of foreign creditors, who, however well disposed they may be to cultivate with us in general friendly relations, are nevertheless, by the law of their own condition, made hostile to the success and permanency of political institutions like ours. Most humiliating may be the embarrassments consequent upon such a condition. Another objection, scarcely less formidable, to the commencement of a new debt, is its inevitable tendency to increase in magnitude, and to foster national extravagance. He has been an unprofitable observer of events, who needs at this day to be admonished of the difficulties which a Government, habitually dependent on loans to sustain its ordinary expenditures, has to encounter in resisting the influences constantly exerted in favor of additional loans; by capitalists, who enrich themselves by Government securities for amounts much exceeding the money they actually advance—a prolific source of individual aggrandizement in all borrowing countries; by stockholders, who seek their gains in the rise and fall of public stocks; and by the selfish importunities of applicants for appropriations for works avowedly for the accommodation of the public, but the real objects of which are, too frequently, the advancement of private interests. The known necessity which so many of the States will be under to impose taxes for the payment of the interest on their debts, furnishes an additional and very cogent reason why the Federal Government should refrain from creating a national debt, by which the people would be exposed to double taxation for a similar object. We possess within ourselves ample resources for every emergency; and we may be quite sure that our citizens, in no future exigency, will be unwilling to supply the Government with all the means asked for the defence of the country. In time of peace there can, at all events, be no justification for the creation of a permanent debt by the Federal Government. Its limited range of constitutional duties may certainly, under such circumstances, be performed without such a resort. It has, it is seen, been avoided during four years of greater fiscal difficulties than have existed in a similar period since the adoption of the Constitution, and one also remarkable for the occurrence of extraordinary causes of expenditures.

But to accomplish so desirable an object, two things are indispensable: first, that the action of the Federal Government be kept within the boundaries prescribed by its founders, and, secondly, that all appropriations for objects admitted to be constitutional, and the expenditure of them also, be subjected to a standard of rigid but well considered and practical economy. The first depends chiefly on the people themselves, the opinions they form of the true construction of the Constitution, and the confidence they repose in the political sentiments of those they select as their representatives in the Federal Legislature; the second rests upon the fidelity with which their more immediate representatives, and other public functionaries, discharge the trusts committed to them. The duty of economizing the expenses of the public service is admitted on all hands; yet there are few subjects upon which there exists a wider difference of opinion than is constantly manifested in regard to the fidelity with which that duty is discharged. Neither diversity of sentiment, nor even mutual recriminations, upon a point in respect to which the public mind is so justly sensitive, can well be entirely avoided; and least so at periods of great political excitement. An intelligent people, however, seldom fail to arrive, in the end, at correct conclusions in such a matter. Practical economy in the management of public affairs can have no adverse influence to contend with more powerful than a large surplus revenue; and the unusually large appropriations for 1837 may, without doubt, independently of the extraordinary requisitions for the public service growing out of the state of our Indian relations, be, in no inconsiderable degree, traced to this source. The sudden and rapid distribution of the large surplus then in the Treasury, and the equally sudden and unprecedentedly severe revulsion in the commerce and business of the country, pointing with unerring certainty to a great and protracted reduction of the revenue, strengthened the propriety of the earliest practicable reduction of the public expenditures.

But, to change a system operating upon so large a surface, and applicable to such numerous and diversified interests and objects, was more than the work of a day. The attention of every department of the Government was immediately, and in good faith, directed to that end; and has been so continued to the present moment. The estimates and appropriations for the year 1838 (the first over which I had any control) were somewhat diminished. The expenditures of 1839 were reduced six millions of dollars. Those of 1840, exclusive of disbursements for public debt and trust claims, will probably not exceed twenty-two and a half millions; being between two and three millions less than those of the preceding year, and nine or ten millions less than those of 1837. Nor has it been found necessary, in order to produce this result, to resort to the power conferred by Congress, of postponing certain classes of the public works, except by deferring expenditures for a short period upon a limited portion of them; and which postponement terminated some time since, at the moment the Treasury Department, by further receipts from the indebted banks, became fully assured of its ability to meet them without prejudice to the public service in other respects. Causes are in operation which will, it is believed, justify a still further reduction, without injury to any important national interest. The expenses of sustaining the troops employed in Florida have been gradually and greatly reduced, through the persevering efforts of the War Department; and a reasonable hope may be entertained that the necessity for military operations in that quarter will soon cease. The removal of the Indians from within our settled borders is nearly completed. The pension list, one of the heaviest charges upon the Treasury, is rapidly diminishing by death. The most costly of our public buildings are either finished, or nearly so; and we may, I think, safely promise ourselves a continued exemption from border difficulties.

The available balance in the Treasury on the first of January next is estimated at one million and a half of dollars. This sum, with the expected receipts from all sources during the next year, will, it is believed, be sufficient to enable the Government to meet every engagement, and leave a suitable balance in the Treasury at the end of the year, if the remedial measures connected with the customs and the public lands, heretofore recommended, shall be adopted, and the new appropriations by Congress shall not carry the expenditures beyond the official estimates.

The new system established by Congress for the safekeeping of the public money, prescribing the kind of currency to be received for the public revenue, and providing additional guards and securities against losses, has now been several months in operation. Although it might be premature, upon an experience of such limited duration, to form a definite opinion in regard to the extent of its influences in correcting many evils under which the Federal Government and the country have hitherto suffered, especially those that have grown out of banking expansions, a depreciated currency, and official defalcations, yet it is but right to say that nothing has occurred in the practical operation of the system to weaken in the slightest degree, but much to strengthen the confident anticipations of its friends. The grounds of these have been heretofore so fully explained, as to require no recapitulation. In respect to the facility and convenience it affords in conducting the public service, and the ability of the Government to discharge through its agency every duty attendant on the collection, transfer, and disbursement of the public money with promptitude and success, I can say with confidence that the apprehensions of those who felt it to be their duty to oppose its adoption, have proved to be unfounded. On the contrary, this branch of the fiscal affairs of the Government has been, and it is believed may always be, thus carried on with every desirable facility and security. A few changes and improvements in the details of the system, without affecting any principles involved in it, will be submitted to you by the Secretary of the Treasury, and will, I am sure, receive at your hands that attention to which they may, on examination, be found to be entitled.

I have deemed this brief summary of our fiscal affairs necessary to the due performance of a duty specially enjoined upon me by the Constitution. It will serve, also, to illustrate more fully the principles by which I have been guided in reference to two contested points in our public policy, which were earliest in their development, and have been more important in their consequences, than any that have arisen under our complicated and difficult, yet admirable, system of Government: I allude to a national debt, and a national bank. It was in these that the political contests by which the country has been agitated ever since the adoption of the Constitution, in a great measure, originated; and there is too much reason to apprehend that the conflicting interests and opposing principles thus marshalled, will continue, as heretofore, to produce similar, if not aggravated, consequences.

Coming into office the declared enemy of both, I have earnestly endeavored to prevent a resort to either.

The consideration that a large public debt affords an apology, and produces, in some degree, a necessity also, for resorting to a system and extent of taxation which is not only oppressive throughout, but likewise so apt to lead, in the end, to the commission of that most odious of all offences against the principles of Republican government—the prostitution of political power, conferred for the general benefit, to the aggrandizement of particular classes, and the gratification of individual cupidity—is alone sufficient, independently of the weighty objections which have already been urged, to render its creation and existence the sources of bitter and unappeasable discord. If we add to this, its inevitable tendency to produce and foster extravagant expenditures of the public money, by which a necessity is created for new loans and new burdens on the people; and, finally, if we refer to the examples of every Government which has existed, for proof how seldom it is that the system, when once adopted and implanted in the policy of a country, has failed to expand itself, until public credit was exhausted, and the people were no longer able to endure its increasing weight, it seems impossible to resist the conclusion, that no benefits resulting from its career, no extent of conquest, no accession of wealth to particular classes; nor any, nor all its combined advantages, can counterbalance its ultimate but certain results—a splendid Government, and an impoverished people.

If a National Bank was, as is undeniable, repudiated by the framers of the Constitution as incompatible with the rights of the States and the liberties of the people; if, from the beginning, it has been regarded by large portions of our citizens as coming in direct collision with that great and vital amendment of the Constitution, which declares that all powers not conferred by that instrument on the General Government are reserved to the States and to the people; if it has been viewed by them as the first great step in the march of latitudinous construction, which, unchecked, would render that sacred instrument of as little value as an unwritten Constitution, dependent, as it would alone be, for its meaning, on the interested interpretation of a dominant party, and affording no security to the rights of the minority; if such is undeniably the case, what rational grounds could have been conceived for anticipating aught but determined opposition to such an institution at the present day.

Could a different result have been expected, when the consequences which have flowed from its creation, and particularly from its struggles to perpetuate its existence, had confirmed, in so striking a manner, the apprehensions of its earliest opponents; when it had been so clearly demonstrated that a concentrated money-power, wielding so vast a capital, and combining such incalculable means of influence, may, in those peculiar conjunctures to which this Government is unavoidably exposed, prove an overmatch for the political power of the people themselves; when the true character of its capacity to regulate, according to its will and its interests, and the interests of its favorites, the value and production of the labor and property of every man in this extended country, had been so fully and fearfully developed; when it was notorious that all classes of this great community had, by means of the power and influence it thus possesses, been infected to madness with a spirit of heedless speculation; when it had been seen that, secure in the support of the combination of influences by which it was surrounded, it could violate its charter, and set the laws at defiance with impunity; and when, too, it had become most apparent that to believe that such an accumulation of powers can ever be granted without the certainty of being abused, was to indulge in a fatal delusion?

To avoid the necessity of a permanent debt, and its inevitable consequences. I have advocated, and endeavored to carry into effect, the policy of confining the appropriations for the public service to such objects only as are clearly within the constitutional authority of the Federal Government; of excluding from its expenses those improvident and unauthorized grants of public money for works of internal improvement, which were so wisely arrested by the constitutional interposition of my predecessor, and which, if they had not been so checked, would long before this time have involved the finances of the General Government in embarrassments far greater than those which are now experienced by any of the States, of limiting all our expenditures to that simple, unostentatious, and economical administration of public affairs, which is alone consistent with the character of our institutions; of collecting annually from the customs, and the sales of public lands, a revenue fully adequate to defray all the expenses thus incurred, but, under no pretence whatsoever, to impose taxes upon the people to a greater amount than was actually necessary to the public service, conducted upon the principles I have stated.

In lieu of a national bank, or a dependence upon banks of any description, for the management of our fiscal affairs, I recommended the adoption of the system which is now in successful operation. That system affords every requisite facility for the transaction of the pecuniary concerns of the Government; will, it is confidently anticipated, produce in other respects many of the benefits which have been from time to time expected from the creation of a national bank, but which have never been realized; avoid the manifold evils inseparable from such an institution; diminish, to a greater extent than could be accomplished by any other measure of reform, the patronage of the Federal Government—a wise policy in all Governments, but more especially so in one like ours, which works well only in proportion as it is made to rely for its support upon the unbiassed and unadulterated opinions of its constituents; do away, forever, all dependence on corporate bodies, either in the raising, collecting, safekeeping, or disbursing the public revenues, and place the Government equally above the temptation of fostering a dangerous and unconstitutional institution at home, or the necessity of adapting its policy to the views and interests of a still more formidable money-power abroad.

It is by adopting and carrying out these principles, under circumstances the most arduous and discouraging, that the attempt has been made, thus far successfully, to demonstrate to the people of the United States that a National Bank at all times; and a national debt, except it be incurred at a period when the honor and safety of the nation demand the temporary sacrifice of a policy, which should only be abandoned in such exigencies, are not merely unnecessary, but in direct and deadly hostility to the principles of their Government, and to their own permanent welfare.

The progress made in the development of these positions, appears in the preceding sketch of the past history and present state of the financial concerns of the Federal Government. The facts there stated fully authorize the assertion, that all the purposes for which this Government was instituted have been accomplished during four years of greater pecuniary embarrassment than were ever before experienced in time of peace, and in the face of opposition as formidable as any that was ever before arrayed against the policy of an Administration; that this has been done when the ordinary revenues of the Government were generally decreasing, as well from the operation of the laws, as the condition of the country, without the creation of a permanent public debt, or incurring any liability, other than such as the ordinary resources of the Government will speedily discharge, and without the agency of a National Bank.

If this view of the proceedings of the Government, for the period it embraces, be warranted by the facts as they are known to exist; if the army and navy have been sustained to the full extent authorized by law, and which Congress deemed sufficient for the defence of the country and the protection of its rights and its honor; if its civil and diplomatic service has been equally sustained; if selves for their activity, patience, and enduring courage; the army has been constantly furnished with supplies of every description; and we must look for the causes which have so long procrastinated the issue of the contest, in the vast extent of the theatre of hostilities, the almost insurmountable obstacles presented by the nature of the country, the climate, and the wily character of the savages.

The sites for marine hospitals on the rivers and lakes, which I was authorized to select and cause to be purchased, have all been designated; but, the appropriation not proving sufficient, conditional arrangements only have been made for their acquisition. It is for Congress to decide whether those conditional purchases shall be sanctioned, and the humane intentions of the law carried into full effect.

The navy, as will appear from the accompanying report of the Secretary, has been usefully and honorably employed in the protection of our commerce and citizens in the Mediterranean, the Pacific, on the coast of Brazil, and in the Gulf of Mexico. A small squadron, consisting of the frigate Constellation and the sloop-of-war Boston, under Commodore Kearney, is now on its way to the China and Indian seas, for the purpose of attending to our interests in that quarter; and Commander Aulick, in the sloop-of-war Yorktown, has been instructed to visit the Sandwich and Society islands, the coasts of New Zealand and Japan, together with other ports and islands frequented by our whale-ships, for the purpose of giving them countenance and protection, should they be required. Other smaller vessels have been, and still are, employed in prosecuting the surveys of the coast of the United States, directed by various acts of Congress; and those which have been completed will shortly be laid before you.

The Exploring expedition, at the latest date, was preparing to leave the Bay of Islands, New Zealand, in further prosecution of objects which have thus far been successfully accomplished. The discovery of a new continent, which was first seen in latitude 66° 2' south, longitude 154° 27' east, and afterwards in latitude 66° 31' south, longitude 153° 40' east, by Lieutenant Wilkes and Hudson, for an extent of eighteen hundred miles, but on which they were prevented from landing by vast bodies of ice which encompassed it, is one of the honorable results of the enterprise. Lieutenant Wilkes bears testimony to the zeal and good conduct of his officers and men; and it is but justice to that officer to state that he appears to have performed the duties assigned to him with an ardor, ability, and perseverance, which give every assurance of an honorable issue to the undertaking.

The report of the Postmaster General, herewith transmitted, will exhibit the service of that Department the past year, and its present condition. The transportation has been maintained during the year to the full extent authorized by the existing laws; some improvements have been effected, which the public interest seemed urgently to demand, but not involving any material additional expenditure; the contractors have generally performed their engagements with fidelity; the postmasters, with few exceptions, have rendered their accounts and paid their quarterly balances with promptitude; and the whole service of the Department has maintained the efficiency for which it has for several years been distinguished.

The acts of Congress establishing new mail routes, and requiring more expensive services on others, and the increasing wants of the country, have, for three years past, carried the expenditures something beyond the accruing revenues; the excess having been met, until the past year, by the surplus which had previously accumulated. That surplus having been exhausted, and the anticipated increase in the revenue not having been realized, owing to the depression in the commercial business of the country, the finances of the department exhibit a small deficiency at the close of the last fiscal year. Its resources, however, are ample; and the reduced rates of compensation for the transportation service, which may be expected on the future lettings, from the general reduction of prices, with the increase of revenue that may reasonably be anticipated from the revival of commercial activity, must soon place the finances of the department in a prosperous condition.

Considering the unfavorable circumstances which have existed during the past year, it is a gratifying result that the revenue has not declined, as compared with the preceding year, but, on the contrary, exhibits a small increase; the circumstances referred to having had no other effect than to check the expected income.

It will be seen that the Postmaster General suggests certain improvements in the establishment, designed to reduce the weight of the mails, cheapen the transportation, ensure greater regularity in the service, and secure a considerable reduction in the rates of letter postage—an object highly desirable. The subject is one of general interest to the community, and is respectfully recommended to your consideration.

The suppression of the African slave trade has received the continued attention of the Government. The brig Dolphin and schooner Grampus have been employed during the last season on the coast of Africa, for the purpose of preventing such portions of that trade as was said to be prosecuted under the American flag. After cruising off those parts of the coast most usually resorted to by slavers, until the commencement of the rainy season, these vessels returned to the United States for supplies, and have since been despatched on a similar service.

From the reports of the commanding officers, it appears that the trade is now principally carried on under Portuguese colors; and they express the opinion that the apprehension of their presence on the slave coast has, in a great degree, arrested the prostitution of the American flag to this inhuman purpose. It is hoped that, by continuing to maintain this force in that quarter, and by the exertions of the officers in command, much will be done to put a stop to whatever portion of this traffic may have been carried on under the American flag, and to prevent its use in a trade which, while it violates the laws, is equally an outrage on the rights of others and the feelings of humanity. The efforts of the several Governments who are anxiously seeking to suppress this traffic must, however, be directed against the facilities afforded by what are now recognised as legitimate commercial pursuits, before that object can be fully accomplished. Supplies of provisions, water-casks, merchandise, and articles connected with the prosecution of the slave-trade, are, it is understood, freely carried by vessels of different nations to the slave factories; and the effects of the factors are transported openly from one slave station to another, without interruption or punishment by either of the nations to which they belong, engaged in the commerce of that region. I submit to your judgments whether this Government, having been the first to prohibit, by adequate penalties, the slave trade—the first to declare it piracy—should not be the first, also, to forbid to its citizens all trade with the slave factories on the coast of Africa; giving an example to all nations in this respect, which, if fairly followed, cannot fail to produce the most effective results in breaking up those dens of iniquity.

Washington, December 5, 1840.

The message having been read,

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD,

Ordered, That the message and accompanying documents be printed; and that five thousand copies of the message, and fifteen hundred copies of the message and accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by his annual report on the finances, which was ordered to be printed.

REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, ON THE STATE OF THE FINANCES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 7, 1840.

The undersigned respectfully submits to Congress the following report on the finances:

He has great pleasure in announcing that during the present year the expenditures have been still further reduced; and, though the revenue has not proved so large as usual, all the public engagements have been met with promptitude.

I. The receipts and means for 1840, exclusive of trusts and the Post Office has been as follows:

The available balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1840, is computed to have been - $2,246,749 00

The data on which this conclusion rests, connected with the actual receipts and expenditures in 1839, and with the unavailable condition of a portion of the public funds, may be seen in the statements annexed.

During the first three quarters of the present year the nett receipts from customs were - $10,689,884 78

During the same period the receipts from lands were - 2,630,217 25

Miscellaneous receipts for the same time - 77,660 98

Estimated receipts for the fourth quarter from all these sources - 3,800,000 00

These make the aggregate of ordinary receipts for the year - 17,197,763 01

Add the estimated receipts of principal and interest in 1840, out of what was due from former deposit banks, but not available on the 1st of January last - $850,000 00

Add also the estimated receipts from the fourth bond of the United States Bank - 2,500,000 00

Deduct from the issue of Treasury notes instead of others redeemed - 5,440,000 00

Aggregate from these additional sources - 8,790,000 00

This will make the total means in 1840, as ascertained and estimated - $28,234,512 01

It is proper to remark, that about $700,000 of the sums computed to be received within the year from the banks above described, have not yet been ascertained to be paid; and if, contrary to expectation, there should be a failure to pay any part of them until next year, it will make a difference to that extent in the preceding results.

II. The expenditures for 1840, exclusive of trusts and the Post Office, have been as follows:

For the first three quarters: civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous - $4,118,248 64

For the same time, military - 8,750,784 52

For the same time, naval - 4,620,316 35

Estimates by this Department (though higher by the others) for all expenses during the fourth quarter - 5,000,000 00

These make the aggregate of current expenses for the whole year 22,489,349 51

Add for funded debt and interest for that of the cities of the District of Columbia during the year, ascertained and estimated - 100,000 00

Redemption of Treasury notes, including principal and interest, ascertained during the first three quarters - 3,629,306 61

Estimate of notes that will be redeemed in the fourth quarter - 425,000 00

This will make the aggregate of payments or expenditures of all kinds 26,643,656 12
 Leaving an available balance of money in the Treasury on the 31st December, 1840, computed to be 1,590,855 89
$28,234,512 01

The funds on hand, considered not available for public purposes, at the commencement as well as close of the present year, are described particularly in the statement annexed.

Previous to the close of the year, should Congress pass any new appropriations which may be immediately expended, an additional charge to that extent will thus be imposed on 1840; and if amounting to any considerable sum, it might prudently be accompanied by some provision of new means sufficient for its payment.

III. The condition of the public debt next demands consideration.

An exhibit of the particulars of it, whether funded or unfunded, and of the payments made within the year on account of both, is annexed.

Probably none of the former kind of debt exists which is due, except what has been forgotten, or the evidence of it mislaid; as all ever claimed, whether incurred in the Revolution, or since, has been promptly discharged. It is fortunate that no new debt of a permanent character has been recently created by the General Government; and the undersigned, for reasons formerly explained, which need not be here repeated, has uniformly considered it sound policy never to incur one in time of peace. But it will be recollected that Congress, by an act passed in May, 1836, engaged, under special conditions, to make payment of a debt due from the cities of the District of Columbia to certain individuals abroad.

The principal amounted of $1,500,000, and was to be paid in yearly instalments of $60,000 each, beginning the 1st of January, 1841. But the interest was payable quarterly, and, during the last four years, has been regularly discharged by the Treasury.

Within the past year, notice has been received from the agent of the creditors that payment of the first and subsequent instalments of the principal is desired to be made, when due, with punctuality. To insure a compliance with that wish, it will be necessary, besides meeting the interest quarterly, to advance $60,000 of the principal at the commencement of the ensuing year; and the residue must be paid, in like amounts, annually hereafter, till the whole is discharged.

The canal stocks, assigned to secure these payments, can, by the terms of the agreement, be sold to aid in reimbursing them. But, in the first instance, the money is to be taken from the Treasury, under existing laws, which appropriate sufficient to discharge all outstanding debts; and a sale, if able to be made afterwards, must probably be at a great sacrifice. Congress may therefore, in its wisdom, think further legislation on the subject expedient.

This is all the funded debt not due, and likewise all of it not paid, except, as before explained, the inconsiderable portions never yet demanded.

In respect to the unfunded debt: such small parts as were created previous to 1837, and still remain unsatisfied, must, it is presumed, be in that condition from some accident, which has prevented a request to be made for payment.

Nor has any of it, which was incurred since, fallen due, without being discharged whenever claimed.

The whole balance of the four emissions of Treasury notes made since October, 1837, which was outstanding on the 1st instant, amounted only to $4,433,823. This is but $1,675,498 more than at the close of 1839, notwithstanding the great decline in our revenue since, and the unexpectedly large expenditures of old appropriations connected with the Florida war, and the further adjustment of claims in behalf of Indians.

Had these events not happened, less even than that amount of notes would have been issued, and the Treasury might, with ease, have redeemed within the year all that were outstanding.

It could have done the same, also, with most of them, had Congress, at the last session, passed the declaratory act concerning the tariff, modified the system of drawbacks to correspond with the existing duties, and adopted the propositions made for graduating the price of the public lands, as well as forming new land districts.

It must be gratifying to learn, however, that, though incommenced by the failure of those measures, and the unexpected circumstances before enumerated, the Department has been enabled, by other means under its control, to redeem every note presented, and to pay, with punctuality, all debts that have fallen due.

The credit of the General Government has thus thus been preserved so high, that, instead of sacrificing its securities at large discounts, as in this and foreign nations some have been compelled to do with public stocks, the Treasury notes have continued at par during the year, though never bearing an interest higher than 5-5 per cent. and subject even to the stoppage of that, after sixty days' notice.

In fine, on a review of the whole subject, our situation respecting a public debt of any kind will be found a most favored one. Regarded as an indication either of the good state of the national credit, or the ample resources of the General Government, or the discreet legislation relative to its fiscal concerns, it will be difficult to discover many eras more prosperous in these respects, whether in the annals of this or any other country.

IV. The exports and imports within the year ending September 30, 1840, exhibit several striking peculiarities. While the foreign commerce of the country constitutes the chief basis of the revenue of the General Government, and is indicative of the extent of our surplus produce, the statistical returns in relation to the subject must excite constant attention among statesmen and political economists, as well as merchants.

The exports during the year are computed to have been $131,571,950. This amount is quite $10,543,534 more than in 1839, notwithstanding the reduced price of some of our great staples, and is larger than ever existed before in our history.

Of the whole exports, only $17,809,333 were of foreign origin. This left those of domestic origin at $113,762,617, being $6,845,937 more than in any previous year.

The imports during 1840 were about $104,805,891. This shows the great falling off from the previous year of $57,236,241. It furnishes, likewise, the principal explanation of the extraordinary diminution which has occurred in the revenue from customs; a diminution, however, which has been caused, in part, by evasions of the laws, new judicial constructions left uncorrected, and the payment of too large sums for bounties and drawbacks, under an omission in the existing tariff to reduce them in a ratio equal to the reduction going on in the duties.

The difference between our exports and imports has usually been in favor of the latter. Several years ago it ranged that way about seven millions of dollars annually; but, of late, the average has risen to near twenty millions annually; the excess of imports having been, in 1836 even, $61,316,995, and in 1839 $41,063,716. But during 1840, the extraordinary occurrence of a reverse in this state of things has taken place. Such a circumstance as the exports at all exceeding the imports, is believed to have happened previously only six times since the Constitution was adopted; and then, never to an extent beyond $7,916,831. Now, however, without any inflation, and in some important articles under a contraction of prices, the excess of exports is not only more than ever was known before, but quite threefold greater, being computed to equal $26,766,059.

This excess having failed to produce the usual corresponding increase of imports, but, on the contrary, having been accompanied by a diminution never previously equalled in amount, except under the influence of the embargo in 1808, the whole matter furnishes another proof of the hazardous fluctuations in the chief source of our present revenue, which Congress has been requested so repeatedly to guard against by some permanent provision.

It is also a strong illustration of the probability of the conjecture expressed in the last annual report, that the country had become alarmingly indebted abroad; in part on ordinary mercantile credit, but chiefly on stocks of corporations and States.

To meet what would soon be due for interest alone, it was then supposed would require twelve or thirteen millions of the exports; and which, in that event, would of course furnish no returns in imports. The same result must follow yearly, till the old stocks are redeemed, unless new ones can, for some time longer, be sold; and the difficulty be thus deferred, though merely at the expense of increasing the whole ultimate indebtedness.

But it is a source of great satisfaction to witness the indications which the unprecedented amount of exports, during the last four years, has given of the continued prosperity of the country.

Notwithstanding some depressions in particular branches of business, or in particular places, the general prosperity has been such as to create a large surplus of products, and to enable us to send abroad immense and increased values of them, however great the complaints have been as to low prices.

These official records are some of the most authentic tests of truth, amidst contradictory conjectures on topics like these. They show that we have been able to spare, in exports of domestic productions during the last four years, quite $408,894,743 in value; while in no previous term of that length, since the adoption of the Constitution, have they exceeded $359,447,622. Except in the last two series of four years, they have never gone beyond $239,576,749; or, not two-thirds as high as from 1837 to 1840. The whole tonnage of the country has also advanced within the four years past, more than 20,000 tons.

Seldom, indeed, if ever, has the navigating interest, one of the great exponents of our wealth and increased commerce, been so prosperous as within the last twelve months.

It is true that a portion of the increase in exports may be attributable to some alteration in the habits of the community, not connected with additional wealth.

The disposition in families to rely less on their own resources, and obtain more by means of mercantile exchanges abroad as well as at home, has, without doubt, grown more rapidly of late years than formerly, and tended to augment both the imports and exports beyond what the real increase in the amount of products would indicate. Yet the great excess of exports during the last few years, over those of previous times, cannot all have arisen from these circumstances. Granting, however, that some of it has; the consequences to that extent, and in another view of the subject, are not so well calculated to excite gratification. The increased dependence which the change of habits, in selling and buying so much more of what is consumed, has occasioned between different countries and those engaged in different avocations, as well as the increased credit thus demanded through many new ramifications, and the greater subjection thus produced of almost every pursuit to the evils attendant on fluctuations in prices, on bank expansions, and revulsions in commerce, have probably exercised an influence on the events of the last four years not inconsiderable nor salutary. Combined with other causes, they must certainly have tended to effect a wide and unfavorable alteration in public manners; and may, in time, inflict an injury on the morals and character of the nation, which will more than counterbalance all the gains in wealth.

V. The estimates of the receipts and expenditures for 1841 next demand attention.

The actual receipts and expenditures in that year can, of course, be so regulated by Congress, through new legislation, as to reach nearly any amount it may deem proper. But the undersigned can neither increase nor diminish them; though a duty is developed on him, in respect to the subject, while at the head of the Treasury, which he now proceeds to perform—of presenting some opinion concerning the amounts to which, under the existing laws, and the calls of the different departments, they are likely to attain.

He will further suggest any general changes which appear to him expedient, as well as any new means deemed necessary to meet all the burdens, which, it is apprehended, may be imposed.

The estimates for the ordinary receipts and expenditures in the ensuing year differ some millions from what will be actually received and expended in the present one.

It is calculated, however, that the difference will be what is always most desirable,—some increase of the receipts, and a further diminution of the expenditures.

The estimates for the latter, in the present year, were made less than those of 1839; and the results have corresponded. Indeed, it is a cause of much gratification that the expectations heretofore cherished, of materially reducing the public burdens, have been verified to so great an extent. Thus, the expenses of 1838 fell below those of 1837; while the expenses of 1839, notwithstanding the continuance of the Florida war, were nearly eight millions below those of 1838; and it is expected that the expenses of 1840 will be from two to three millions still lower, or quite ten millions less than those of 1838.

They would have been nearly twelve millions less, had not that war continued, and unusually large payments been made to Indians, under old appropriations.

It is believed that the ordinary expenses of 1841 ought to fall some millions below those in 1840; as the pensions have diminished by deaths, fewer Indians remain to be removed, several expensive public buildings have been mostly finished, and hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close.

More details concerning the estimates for the next year will be proper, and will illustrate the correctness of some of the preceding results.

It may be stated, from the best data in possession of this Department, that the receipts, under the existing laws, will probably be as follows:

From customs	$19,000,000
From lands	3,500,000
From miscellaneous	80,000
Add the expected balance in the Treasury, available on the 1st of January next	1,580,855

The aggregate of ordinary means for the next year would then be 24,160,855

There will be nothing more, either of principal or interest, due from banks, which is likely to be made available, except about 220,000

A power will exist, under the act of 31st March, 1840, to issue Treasury notes till a year from its passage expires, but not to make the whole emission outstanding at any one time exceed five millions of dollars.

This will furnish additional means, equal to the computed amount which can be issued at the close of the present year, being about 343,618

Hence, there may be added, from these several sources, so much as to make the whole means for the next year 24,723,473

On the other hand, the expenditures for 1841 for ordinary purposes, if Congress make no reduction in the appropriations requested by the different departments, are estimated at 19,250,000

This would leave a balance in the Treasury, at the close of the year, equal to 5,473,473

But certain payments must also be made on account of the funded and unfunded debt, unless Congress authorize contracts to be formed for extending the time of their payment. Thus, there will be required—

On account of the funded debt, chiefly for the cities of this District	$149,200
For the redemption of Treasury notes, if all the others be issued which can be under the present law, as then the amount returned within A. D. 1841 will probably not exceed	4,500,000
	$4,649,200

Estimated balance in the Treasury at the close of the next year, after all payments whatever	$824,273

Thus it will be seen that if the whole of these charges, both ordinary and extraordinary, should be required to be extinguished in 1841, the estimated means will be sufficient for that purpose, but may not, besides, leave so large a balance in the Treasury as is convenient and useful. The best mode of obviating any difficulty which might arise from that circumstance will soon be considered by itself.

For some further general view of the grounds of the estimate of the expenditures for 1841, it will be necessary to advert a few moments to the new and old appropriations from which those expenditures are to be made.

The new ones, proposed by the different Departments for the service of 1841, amount to $16,621,520 28.

Viz: Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous	$3,450,740 13
Military	7,725,440 94
Naval	5,445,339 21

Besides these, certain permanent appropriations under existing laws will become chargeable on the Treasury during the next year, in sums as follows:

For ordinary purposes.
Military	$864,000
For other purposes.
Public debt, including interest and first instalment for the District of Columbia	149,200
Redeeming Treasury notes	4,500,000

These would make the new charges, for ordinary purposes, under both new and permanent appropriations, amount to $17,485,520 28. But, including the public debt and the redemption of Treasury notes, these charges would be $22,134,720 28.

It will be perceived, therefore, that the aggregate of actual expenditures during 1841 has been computed to be $1,764,480 higher than the estimated amount of new and permanent appropriations. This is done not only because some small oversights have doubtless occurred in the latter, and unavoidable omissions, as will be seen by the notes, but some new private bills, granting money, may be passed by Congress, and a greater proportion of the outstanding appropriations at the end of 1840 (though reduced as much as three or four millions less than at the end of 1839) may be expended in 1841, than will be left unexpended of the new charges imposed. These last two items are usually computed to equal each other. The Departments calculate that $6,661,123 of the old appropriations will be required to complete the purposes originally contemplated by them.

They propose only to apply about $3,749,904 of them to the service of the ensuing year, without re-appropriation; and the residue, amounting to $138,878, it is expected will go to the surplus fund. They estimate the whole of them at the close of the year to be $10,549,905.

VI. A few more explanations of other grounds for the estimates of receipts and expenditures for the next year may be useful.

It will be noticed that the estimates for both are founded principally on the existing laws. Should Congress, therefore, alter the tariff, so as to increase or reduce the duties, the expected amount of receipts must of course be varied in that proportion.

So it must be if Congress makes any essential change in respect to the public lands, and either passes a graduation bill, and creates new land districts in which surveys are ready for large sales, as this would increase the immediate receipts; or if, on the other hand, it should distribute the proceeds of the sales among the States, as that would diminish the revenue applicable to the purposes of the General Government, and render a resort to new taxation, an increased tariff, or a loan, indispensable, to the extent of the distribution.

The estimates of the receipts from customs have been lessened somewhat, because the importation of certain articles paying a duty will, in 1841, be partially postponed to 1842, in consequence of the great reduction in the tariff on them which will take place in the latter year under the existing laws.

So have they been on account of the greater proportionate bounties and drawbacks which are now returned on several articles, and some beneficial operation anticipated from the Independent Treasury in checking speculation.

On the contrary, the revulsions in business which have occurred since the middle of 1839, and deeply affected the revenue of some other countries as well as our own, and the protracted suspension of specie payments by many of the banks, which has continued over a large part of the United States since October in that year, will probably terminate soon, by the salutary reaction of great commercial principles; and that event must be accompanied by a considerable increase of imports and duties. The amount of the latter, therefore, has been estimated higher than the actual receipts in the present year, but not so high as they were in 1839 by about two millions, nor so high as many anticipate they will be. But if the banks do not speedily resume, it is to be feared that the estimate will prove larger, instead of smaller, than events will verify.

The revenue from lands must continue to be lower under the present laws than might otherwise be expected, because that portion of the vast sales in 1835 and 1836 which were made to speculators, must for some years longer come into the market in competition with the Government; and the emigration to Texas, as well as the continuance of the suspension of specie payments by the banks over much of the West and Southwest, is likely to operate injuriously somewhat longer, though probably with a force much diminished.

In respect to the estimates for expenditures, it need only be observed here, that any considerable addition made by Congress to the new appropriations called for, would require a provision of further means to meet them, corresponding in amount; and any diminution in those appropriations would also reduce, in a similar manner, the amount of means otherwise necessary.

VII. It is proper to advert next to the best mode of avoiding any inequality between the anticipated receipts and expenditures, either in 1841 or 1842.

It has already been shown that the whole amount of receipts in 1841 will probably be sufficient to discharge all ordinary expenditures, and those parts of the outstanding debt, funded or unfunded, which may become due. But the preservation of a suitable balance in the Treasury may require more than what will probably be left after satisfying other purposes. The raising of any sum for that object in 1841 could, however, be obviated by authorizing a contract to be made, under proper restrictions, extending the period of payment for a portion of the temporary liabilities falling due in that year. Yet, in the opinion of the undersigned, the best mode of providing for this case would be, without either an extension of this kind, or a loan, or a further issue of Treasury notes, or a change in the tariff; but merely by lessening the appropriations for the service of 1841 below the estimates, or by passing such declaratory clauses as to the present tariff, and such acts as to the public lands, as have heretofore been urged on the consideration of Congress.

The arguments in favor of some further diminution in our expenditures, and the general items in which the reduction is considered most compatible with the public interests, were so fully exhibited in the last two annual reports as to render a repetition of them unnecessary.

It was then believed that the laws could be alter-el so as to admit of safely curtailing the appropriations at once, to such an extent that the expenditures need not exceed, in the aggregate, seventeen or eighteen millions yearly. After more of the pensions terminate, and the removal of the Indians is completed, they could be beneficially contracted to even less than that amount. Such a reduction as is first adverted to seems, therefore, proper to be adopted now, since it could be effected without the probability of injury to any useful national establishment, would promote public frugality, and supersede the necessity either of higher tariffs, direct taxes, or permanent debts.

If that be not done, the secondary measures before suggested, such as a declaratory act to enforce the present tariff, a suitable modification of the drawbacks and bounties; and the passage of bills graduating the price of public lands, as well as creating some new districts for the sale of them, would be likely, if taking effect early, to yield a suitable supply in the course of the year.

It will be observed, however, that though, under either of these arrangements, enough might be obtained within the whole of 1841 for the objects contemplated, yet not a due or sufficient proportion in the first quarter; because by that time all the measures are not likely to go into full operation, nor much of the anticipated increase to happen in the actual receipts of duties under existing laws. Unusually heavy expenses will also fall on that quarter in the next year. In addition to a full portion of most of the current expenses, and the whole pension payments for the first half of the year, and one-third of a million, or more, for all the annual fishing bounties; there will be imposed on it most of the charges for the whole year connected with the session of Congress and private bills, as well as large payments for taking the census, and for the first instalment of the debt of this District; several of them as early even as the first day of January.

From these circumstances, and the considerations that all which is due from the banks may not be then paid, and that the balance in the Treasury, under the policy adopted by Congress of late years, will of necessity be small, while the fluctuations and inequalities are very great between the receipts and expenditures in different portions of the year, to which we are constantly exposed from causes that have on former occasions been explained at length, it must be obvious that entire safety requires a conditional power to be seasonably conferred on the Executive to obtain at any time with 1841 such subsidiary means as may be needed for a few months, and as may be sufficient to enable the Treasury punctually to discharge, during that year, all the liabilities imposed by Congress.

There is another contingency under the existing laws, as to duties, which requires attention, with a view to be properly prepared for it; though legislation concerning the subject is not necessary so early as in the other case, because the event on which it depends cannot actually happen till the year 1842.

Thus the progressive reduction of the present tariff, which has been going on since 1833, will, after December, 1841, take effect to a much larger extent than heretofore. Nearly two millions and a half of dollars will then be deducted at once.

On the 1st of July afterwards, at least two millions and a half more of duties will be removed, making an aggregate, in six months, of quite five millions. If the imports then should not differ much from those in 1833, this would leave an income from them, not probably exceeding ten or eleven millions of dollars yearly. It will therefore be necessary to make corresponding reductions in the expenditures of 1842, or seasonably provide otherwise, in some permanent manner, to supply any wants likely to happen from this cause.

Should Congress conclude that such reduction in the expenditures cannot properly be made, and that the imports for 1842 will not increase beyond those in 1833, the amount of the deficiency would, in those events, probably differ but little from five millions. Such a deficiency would, under these circumstances, be likely to become permanent, and may be considered the first of that character which will occur under the tariff act of 1833.

The idea that such a deficiency in time of peace ought to be supplied by issues of Treasury notes, or by a loan, has never been entertained by the undersigned. Nor can it be countenanced by any sound principles either of finance or political economy. The inquiry then recurs, what other mode would be more eligible? When we possessed an extraordinary surplus, it was considered prudent by Congress to make deposits with the States, with a view to be returned in an exigency, rather than to invest a portion of it safely and productively, so as to be realized in such an event. It would therefore be consistent with that arrangement to recall, in 1842, such part of the surplus as may be then needed.

That course, however, appears not very likely to be adopted, since the former power given to this Department to recall these deposits has been taken away by Congress.

Another practicable mode would be to resort to direct taxes. But this is so unsuited to the general habits, and so uncongenial to the opinions of most of our population, that its adoption is not to be anticipated. Some other permanent resource must then be looked to. The choice will probably rest between the large reduction of expenditures, with the other accompanying measures before specified, and some extensive modification of the present tariff. Explanations have heretofore been given by the undersigned in favor of the former course; and it would probably prove sufficient to meet the emergency, if the reduction be pushed vigorously, and especially if the imports after 1841 shall exceed those in 1833, which is regarded as probable.

But Congress may not coincide with him in opinion on these points, and, for covering the contingency, may consider the adoption of some permanent change in the tariff as preferable, and as not too early at the present session, to give full notice of its character, before going into operation, in order that the different interests most affected by it shall have time to become gradually adjusted to its provisions.

In that event, it might be supposed that the undersigned had avoided due responsibility, and a timely discharge of duty, if he were not prepared to offer some views concerning the details, as well as general principles, which he deems applicable to such a change. He has therefore examined the subject, and is ready to present the results at any moment either House of Congress shall express a wish to that effect. But he refrains from submitting them without a special request, because some doubt exist, under circumstances which can be properly appreciated, as to the delicacy of his discussing a measure at this time, which the Legislature may not consider it necessary to act on till a new Congress assembles.

VIII. The mode of keeping the public money recently established by Congress, has thus far answered the expectations of this Department.

The numerous labors, perplexities, and delays of putting a new system into operation, have been mostly overcome, and no losses whatever are known to have occurred under it.

Some of the provisions in the law are deemed objectionable in their details, and are respectfully recommended to Congress for revision. But they are not supposed to affect in the slightest degree any principle involved in the measure.

Thus, the ordinary clerks authorized are numerous enough, yet a principal one is needed at New York city, with such compensation as is usual at a place of so large and important business.

On full inquiry, it has been found also that no site could probably be purchased for the erection of an office at St. Louis, which would be more suitable than a lot now owned by the United States; and it may be, under a further examination which is in progress, that no new building could be erected on that site, which would prove more economical and convenient than one which can be purchased already erected. A suitable change in the appropriation on that subject is therefore respectfully recommended.

A provision is needed likewise in case of vacancies, from any cause whatever, in the offices of receivers general and treasurers. One has formerly been asked in relation to collectors of the customs, in cases of removals and expirations of the terms of office, to prevent an interregnum in the discharge of the duties. This might properly be adopted as to them, and extended to receivers general and the Treasurer of the United States, as well as of the Mint and its branches, in all instances whatever of vacancy or temporary inability of the principal. Perhaps the least objectionable mode to effect this object would be, to direct that the chief clerk of all these officers should, in such cases, and where no other legal provision now exists, be authorized and required to discharge these duties, at the risk and under the responsibility of the principal and his securities, till the vacancy is filled, or the disability removed.

In consequence of some defects in the phraseology of the penal parts of the act, a new clause extending them to all disbursing officers of every character under the General Government would be judicious. A further provision also, respecting the places of deposit, by disbursing officers, of money not in the Treasury, but drawn out and put into their hands for making payments, appears necessary.

The keeping of such money is now regulated by the act of 31 of March, 1809; and if it is intended to bring it within the operation of the late law as to money in the Treasury, it seems proper to do so by an explicit enactment.

The section requiring disbursing officers to sell their drafts for specie alone, though certain proportions of paper are allowed to be received for all public dues, appears not to be in symmetry with those other provisions. The general influence of the present system is believed to have been thus far salutary. The true standard of value has been rendered more familiar, confidence has been increased in its stability, prices have gradually risen, business improved, and exchanges altered greatly for the better.

If something has been or may be lost in convenience, (which is not unlikely,) by the increasing disuse of a paper currency for public payments, much more will probably be gained by the circumstances before enumerated, as well as by the greater security in the use of specie, the more stable value imparted by the present system to property and labor, and the strong check established by it, not only against defalcations, but against bank expansions, excessive speculations, and commercial fluctuations.

Even any inconvenience attending this change in the currency used, if found particularly embarrassing, can be overcome hereafter, and the system still maintained, should Congress feel disposed to adopt the measure which was suggested for that purpose by the undersigned in September, 1837.

Such a measure would often furnish every advantage of a circulating medium, easy of transportation, of the highest possible credit, and at the same time requiring an equal amount of specie to be employed, (though in deposits,) and without subjecting any of the fiscal affairs of the Government to that legal dependence on corporations for their management, which is so objectionable in many respects, as never to have been attempted in the management of any of its other affairs, civil or military.

The topics of the condition of the banks of the Union; the state of the currency; the proper places of deposit for the public funds, and other matters immediately connected with them, have engrossed a considerable portion of the annual reports from this Department for several years.

But the keeping of the money in the Treasury being now separated from the banks, and the kind of money to be received and paid out fixed by new legal provisions, it is not considered material at this time further to discuss these matters, than to submit the general remarks which will be found at the close of this communication.

IX. Some miscellaneous topics connected with the finances deserve a brief notice.

The various measures heretofore recommended to Congress by the undersigned, and which have not yet been finally acted on, are again respectfully recalled to its attention.

Without recapitulating them, it will be found, on a reference to former reports, that many of the subjects possess much importance in a fiscal view, and every year's experience has strengthened the conviction of the usefulness of early action upon them.

It affords me pleasure to state that, since the last session, the Neapolitan Government, under its treaty of indemnity, has paid promptly another installment, which this Department has been enabled to have remitted home early, and distributed among the claimants.

The situation of the General Land Office, and its operations within the year, will be submitted separately in a few days.

Six old land districts have been recently discontinued, under the act of June 12, 1840. It is believed that some others might economically and usefully be abolished by Congress, though not coming within the provisions of that law. Such is the office at Greensburg, Louisiana. One district in Indiana, including the capital of the State, is thought, from its peculiar position, to require special legislation to exempt it from the operation of the late act.

This occasion is taken, also, to renew the recommendations, before presented by this Department to Congress and the appropriate committees, for the discontinuance of certain officers now employed in the collection of duties, whose further services, it has been believed, could be safely dispensed with, in consequence of the reduction in business of late years at the different places where they are stationed. They include some collectors and naval officers, and several surveyors, amounting in all to eighteen, but whose offices cannot be abolished without new legislation.

All the subordinate custom-house officers, which it is competent for this Department, without such legislation, to dispense with, and whose situation was in other respects similar, have already been discontinued, including, within two years, more than fifty officers, and, besides those, five vessels and boats, with nearly one hundred men, in the cutter service. In about forty other cases, the compensation of officers and light-house keepers has been reduced.

X. In closing this last annual report of the undersigned, it may be expected that he would advert, for a moment, to the general character of some of our financial operations during the period of his connection with the Treasury Department.

Though employed in different Executive offices nearly ten years, he has been connected with the Treasury only from six to seven of them.

During this term there has occurred much to evince the great fiscal power, as well as prosperity of the Union. Some reverses have, at times, overtaken the rashness displayed by parts of the community in certain branches business, and have extended their adverse influences to the revenue dependent upon them. But the period and the country, as a whole, have been almost unexampled in prosperous developments.

Thus, in respect to our receipts. Notwithstanding the unusual revulsions in imports on two occasions, so sensibly lessening the revenue; notwithstanding any losses sustained in those crises, by the Government, through officers, banks, or merchants; and notwithstanding the biennial reduction in the duties, which has by law been constantly going on, as well as the remission of several millions to railroad corporations, and under new judicial constructions; yet our condition has been so flourishing, as to yield a revenue during that time sufficient, after all those deductions, to accomplish the following important results. It has enabled the Treasury to meet the current expenditures of the Government, as well as the extraordinary ones by Indian wars, treaties, and other costly measures, and, without imposing any new taxes, or higher tariff, and without any new funded debt whatever, but extinguishing considerable remains of the old one, and paying the interest on that assumed for this District, to save the unprecedented surplus of more than twenty-eight millions of dollars, and deposit the same with the States for safe keeping till needed by the General Government.

The only permanent aid in effecting this, beyond the receipts from ordinary sources, has been the debt due from the United States Bank, of about eight millions, and the Treasury notes now outstanding, equal to nearly four and a half millions. But during that period, a sum not far from the first amount has been applied to the discharge of the principal and interest of the old funded debt; so that, towards the payment of all other expenses, only between four and five millions, beyond what was temporary, and what has already been refunded or adjusted, have been received from any extraneous source whatever.

It follows, therefore, that the current revenue, notwithstanding all reductions, has been adequate to defray both the ordinary and extraordinary demands, and, after taking from what is deposited with the States, sufficient to extinguish every kind of indebtedness created on account of the General Government during the same period, to leave on hand the large balance of nearly twenty-four millions.

It is true that the available sums in the Treasury at the commencement and close of the period in question will probably prove different in amount; but if made equal, a surplus would still be left, which is likely to exceed seventeen or eighteen millions of dollars.

Beside this recorded evidence of the prosperity of the country and the fiscal ability of the General Government in those years, it is gratifying, amidst many misapprehensions concerning the subject, to reflect on another circumstance connected with our financial operations, which has also become matter of history. It is this: Though destitute of the aid of a United States Bank as a fiscal agent during that period, and baffled by various unremedied imperfections in the laws connected with the finances, as well as embarrassed by two suspensions of specie payments by many of the State banks—one still continuing; yet the Treasury has been able to make its vast collections, transfers, and payments, with promptitude, and in most cases with specie or its equivalent.

Some correct judgment can be formed of the extent and difficulty of these operations, when it is recollected that the whole sums which have thus been collected, without deducting fractions, added to those sums which have been paid over chiefly by another class of officers, have exceeded the extraordinary aggregate of $360,000,000, and been dispersed over a territory of nearly two million square miles in extent. It is, moreover, ascertained that the whole losses within the same time by defaults, large and small, and in all kinds of offices, will probably not equal half of one per cent. on that amount; and however official delinquencies may, in some cases, have inevitably been aggravated by the unprecedented speculations of the times, and by great revulsions and failures among banks and individuals, those losses will not be one-fourth so large, in proportion to the amounts collected and paid, as in some previous terms, when the system under a United States Bank was in full operation.

A few words may be proper as to the expenditures during the same period. Though they were of necessity augmented by some of the circumstances before mentioned, two Indian treaties only, out of a large number, having already involved us in the expense of nearly twenty-three millions of dollars; yet the aggregate of all has been much reduced since the influences of those causes and the impulses of an overflowing Treasury have diminished. The expenditures have fallen yearly since 1837, till they are now only twenty-two and a half millions independent of any debt and trusts, and are supposed to be in progress to a still lower amount.

The undersigned has earnestly urged a more rapid reduction. He has considered the great safeguard against a too splendid central government, which would constantly threaten to overshadow all State independence, and attract the ambition of most of the friends of State Rights from humbler paths of frugality and principle into the dazzling vortex of higher patronage, honors, and emoluments. While the stimulants to excesses shall continue to lessen, nothing will be necessary to insure the further success of an economical policy, but perseverance in retrenchments, wherever they are practicable without injury to the public interests. The removals of Indians being mostly finished, and the chief causes of frontier wars extinguished, unless new objects of expenditure be selected, or a great enlargement given to some already existing, the whole amount must, of necessity, contract hereafter very rapidly. The same result will be further promoted by the deaths of pensioners, increasing through advanced age, and the completion of many public works, as well as by persisting in a firm policy to avoid the wasteful expense of unnecessary foreign collisions, and to refrain from those lavish expenditures for certain domestic objects, over which the jurisdiction of the General Government is often questionable, and which always open the widest door to extravagance, favoritism, and corruption.

One of the greatest evils to the public service, as well as to the security of private business, during a part of the above period, has consisted in the fluctuations to which both have been subjected.

With only a single year intervening, and without any material change in the tariff, or any whatever in the price of the public lands, we have seen the revenue from ordinary sources suddenly vary from nearly fifty millions annually to eighteen; and, on two occasions since, vibrate to the extraordinary extent of nearly eight and eleven millions yearly.

The transactions of individuals upon which our revenue depends, must, of course, have undergone an unusual change at the same time.

The imports fell within two years, in the case first referred to, from near one hundred and ninety millions to one hundred and fourteen; and in the single year just passed, fell almost sixty millions. Such inflations and contractions must be destructive of all confidence in calculations for the future, while the causes of them shall continue to operate unremedied.

What were those causes?

They will be found to have been chiefly connected with the abuses of banking. On the occasion first referred to, they were the superabundance of a fictitious medium of circulation, with the attendant overtrading and speculations in 1836, and the consequent suspensions of specie payments in 1837, as well as the disasters and scarcity of any medium till the latter part of A. D. 1838. Then another expansion commenced, extending into 1839, and accompanied by another increase in imports of nearly fifty millions, which ended again in the contractions by banks, suspensions, and commercial reverses, which have suddenly reduced the imports of 1840 more than one-third, and in many places augmented seriously the embarrassments before existing from similar vacillations in the paper currency.

How far some imprudences abroad, at the same time, similar to these, though in a country enjoying any advantages which can result from a National Bank, may have augmented the evils here, by means of the intimate moneyed relations between us, need not now be discussed, though probably their influence was large and unfavorable.

The causes first named were, likewise, in full operation here in 1816 and 1817, and were succeeded by many of the same deplorable consequences in 1819 and 1820. One followed the other as inevitably as the ebb of the tide succeeds its flood.

The great principles of trade can never be long violated with impunity; and any fictitious or unnatural excess of credit soon ends in revulsions, as the essence of legitimate commerce consists in an exchange of values for each other, or of values for what truly represent values, and can be readily converted into them.

All business otherwise becomes a mere game of hazard; speculation must enter into every affair of life; riches and poverty will be dependent on the merest bubbles; prices will change oftener than the wind; regularity in receipts and expenditures be impossible; estimates for the future, whether in public or private matters, become mere conjectures; tariffs require yearly alteration to meet the fluctuations of business; and the community be kept under the constant excitement and depression of the hot and cold fits of a violent fever.

The first remedy sought in 1816, by the establishment of a National Bank, was supposed, during a few ensuing years, to have aggravated those evils; and the next remedy, adopted in 1824 by a high tariff, did not prevent the low prices and bankruptcies of 1825, which covered the country with wrecks and ruin.

Undoubtedly, the best relief on such occasions is to be found in removing the cause of the disease. So far as regards the General Government, this was attempted in 1837, and since, by gradually withdrawing from the use of banks and their paper in its fiscal operations, so as neither to stimulate nor contract their issues by other influences than ordinary business; and by urging on those, who might find their employment sometimes useful, a closer regard in doing it, to the safe and sober influences of the universal laws of trade, as well as an inflexible adherence to the constitutional standard of value.

While the General Government shall continue to pursue such a course, it will mitigate and check the evils which others produce, and which they alone, under the limitations in the Constitution, are able entirely to remove. At all events, it will faithfully perform a momentous duty, and exhibit a useful example for imitation.

In a period of peace and comparative exemption from public debt, as well as from serious difficulty in financial operations, it would hardly seem proper to attempt more by assumptions of doubtful powers, and by forced constructions in favor of measures by no means certain, if adopted, not to aggravate rather than diminish existing evils, and not to produce others of a character still more dangerous. Much less can it be considered respectful either to State rights or the people, and certainly not competent, in the opinion of the undersigned, to exercise such powers by creating moneyed corporations among them, which many of their number have repeatedly denounced as unconstitutional, and the authority to establish which was originally refused rather than confided to the General Government by the people and the States that formed it. But some other powers expressly conferred can, without question, be exercised further than has yet been done by Congress, and in such a manner as to produce very beneficial consequences upon the currency. Still, it is hoped they will never be pushed so as to trespass on ground really doubtful under the Constitution, and prevent the States from continuing to exercise all the legitimate authority they now possess as to banks and debt, however much it may be regretted that public opinion has not yet run with more strength against the abuses of both, and led to their prompt correction. It is not proposed at this time to go into the consideration of farther details on these points. But the danger to be guarded against now, seems to be rather of an opposite character from that of overaction by the General Government in the exercise of its express powers. On the contrary, apprehensions exist that it may not continue firm in the support of all which has already been accomplished in connection with the currency. If it should not, and should thus not aid to correct in any degree the rashness of many to force something like a formidable steam power into all kinds of business, without due guards to prevent constant and fatal explosions, myriads of individuals, as well as some corporations and States, are likely to be overwhelmed in still wider ruin, and will ere long probably look to no escape except the application of the sponge of a general bankrupt law to all private liabilities, and the unconstitutional assumption of the public ones by the General Government, so as to tax oppressively those portions of the community who have any thing left to pay for the losses and follies of the rest.

A remedy which has been adverted to by some, and which consists in the creation of more credit, to cure the mischief of an existing excess of credit, or the formation of larger banks with like power of abuses, in order to correct smaller ones, must usually aggravate the evil; and therefore, where it is free from constitutional objections, may, in point of expediency alone, well be discountenanced.

A plan of free banking, adopted by the States, properly guarded and secured by provisions similar to those recommended by the undersigned as long ago as 1836, with such others as reflection and experience may sanction, appears far preferable. But, independent of that, no changes in the present system, as to banks, seem worthy of strenuous exertions, except those whose direct object shall be to make safer, to restrict, control, and regulate better the institutions that already exist rather than to incorporate more. Above all, should public efforts be directed to strengthen the certainty of prompt specie payments as to all notes out, and of a nearer approach to uniformity in the amount of issues in similar states of trade; and of specie on hand, instead of multiplying them for speculation or cupidity, and thus keeping up a succession of expansions and contractions, which will only inflame the existing disorders, and render the continuance of great fluctuations in all public as well as private affairs unavoidable, endless, and ruinous.

With much respect,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the PRESIDENT of the Senate of the U. S.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN S. SPENCE.

Mr. MERRICK rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Like all other human enjoyments, the gratification of meeting and interchanging our mutual congratulations again on this occasion, is not unmixed with painful and melancholy reflection. To me in an especial manner are the circumstances under which I now rise to address you afflicting. Yonder vacant seat, sir, explains the cause. My most excellent and estimable colleague, the honorable JOHN S. SPENCE, who for the last several years filled that chair with honor to himself, and advantage to his country, is no more. He closed his useful and valuable life in the latter part of the month of October last, at his residence, in Worcester county, Maryland, surrounded by his amiable and interesting family, and at peace with God and man. He was, it will be remembered, in languid health during great part of our last session, and was often detained from his place here by that cause, which finally obliged him to leave the seat of Government, and retire to his own home some time before the adjournment. From the disease which then afflicted him he never perfectly recovered; though there was occasional relief from suffering, there was no effectual cure, and he has now left these and all sublunary scenes forever. He has at different periods of his life filled many of the most important and honorable trusts in the gift of the people of his State, always possessing, always deserving their entire confidence. His course through life was much more of the useful than brilliant order; possessed of a very large stock of sterling worth and virtue, there was about him nothing of ostentatious display. Ever content with the consciousness of doing his duty well and faithfully, he was careless of all other rewards. None knew him who did not honor and esteem him; and all who knew him will join with me in saying that he has left no purer man behind him.

Mr. MERRICK then offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the honorable JOHN S. SPENCE, late a member thereof, will go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the honorable JOHN S. SPENCE, the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, Dec. 9, 1840.

After the Journal had been read,

Mr. RUSSELL offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the daily hour to which this House stand adjourned, be 12 o'clock, meridian, until otherwise ordered.

Resolved, That the Clerk cause the members of this House to be furnished, during the present session, with such newspapers as they may respectively direct, the expense for each member not to exceed at the rate of three daily papers per annum.

Which resolutions were adopted.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. ADAMS, in pursuance of notice given on yesterday, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the standing rule of this House, No. 21, adopted on the 28th of January last, in the following words:

"No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territory, or the slave trade between the States or Territories of the United States, in which it now exists, shall be received by this House, or entertained in any way whatever," be, and the same is hereby rescinded.

Mr. JENIFER moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman from Maryland that the gentleman from Massachusetts was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ADAMS, after some preliminary remarks, which were imperfectly heard by the Reporter, hoped the gentleman from Maryland would not press the motion to lay on the table, as it was not his intention to debate the resolution at that time.

Mr. JENIFER said, that as the gentleman from Massachusetts had no intention of debating the resolution, he would withdraw his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ADAMS, after stating his reasons for offering the resolution at so early a period of the session, observed that he was not willing the rule in question should remain in force for a single hour longer, as, in his opinion, it was a direct violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BANKS did not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution, but of expressing his regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts had thought proper to offer it. It would be recollected that at the last session the subject had been disposed of by a resolution solemnly ratified by the House; but as the gentleman was desirous of again agitating it, he Mr. B. was anxious to meet the question by a direct vote. He therefore moved to lay the resolution on the table.

And the question being on the motion to lay on the table,

Messrs. BANKS and ADAMS simultaneously demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS begged leave to ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw for the present his motion to lay on the table. On so important a subject, he was desirous of the opinion of the whole House, whereas there were not now more than two-thirds of the members in their seats. He was extremely averse to having any partial expression of opinion on the subject, and therefore suggested a postponement of the resolution until that day week.

After the resolution had been again read by the CLERK,

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS further suggested to the gentleman from Virginia, that the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. COST JONSON,] on whose motion the rule in question had been adopted, was not now in his place. Under these circumstances, he thought it no more than fair that the subject should be postponed, in order that the House might have an opportunity of hearing what the gentleman from Maryland might have to say in defence of the rule.

Mr. ADAMS had not the slightest objection to the subject being, for the present, laid on the table, as being on the table it might be called up hereafter, when there should be a full House. He was perfectly willing to hear what the gentleman from Maryland, who had the honor of moving the adoption of the rule, might have to say in defence of it, provided the House would hear what he (Mr. A.) might have to say in reply.

The yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table were then ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Bell, Blackwell, Bond, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Crockett, Cross, John Davis, John W. Davis, G. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Earl, Eastman, Galbraith, Genay, Gerry, Goggin, Green, Habersham, Jno. Hastings, Hawes, Hill of Va., Hill of N. C., Hillea, Hook, Jameson, Jenifer, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McClure, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montana, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Morrow, Nowhard, Nisbet, Parrish, Rayner, Samuels, Shepard, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanley, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumner, Sweeney, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, John B. Thompson, David D. Wagener, Waterson, Weller, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Boardman, Brewster, Briggs, Calhoun, Casey, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Cranston, Edward Davies, Doe, Doig, Everett, Illinois, Fletcher, Gates, Goodie, Granger, Hildan Hall, Augustus C. Hand, Thomas Henry, Hopkins, Jackson, Charles Johnston, Lane, Lincoln, McCulloch, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Osborne, Parmenter, Peck, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Henry Williams, and Winthrop—58.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

After the vote was announced,

Mr. BEIRNE stated that the Clerk had just passed his name, when he entered the hall; and as it was contrary to the rules for him to vote at that time, he asked permission of the House that his name might be recorded on the important vote just taken.

General consent being necessary for that purpose, and some members objecting,

Mr. BEIRNE withdrew his request.

Mr. TOLAND moved that the House adjourn. But the motion was not agreed to.

A message was received from the Senate by their Secretary, informing the House that a quorum of the Senate had assembled, and was ready to proceed to business.

Also, that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House, for the appointment of a Joint Committee of both Houses to wait upon the President of the United States, for the purpose of informing him that the two Houses had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make.

Also, that Messrs. WRIGHT and HUNTINGTON had been chosen to constitute the committee on the part of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, it was Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be elected by Congress—one by each House—to serve during the present session, who shall interchange weekly.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the Annual Message of the President of the United States;

Which having been read,

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, it was

Resolved, That the Message of the President of the United States be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and that fifteen thousand copies thereof with the accompanying documents, and five thousand copies thereof, without the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the members of the House.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS,

The House adjourned.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that at as early a day as the attendance of the Senators would enable him, he would ask leave to introduce a bill for a permanent prospective pre-emption law in favor of the hardy and industrious settlers upon our public lands—the log cabin men. As the session was a short one, he was desirous of taking the earliest opportunity of asking leave to introduce this measure in favor of the tenants of log cabins, and he wished the vote on granting leave to be a test vote on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. FULTON gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, Dec. 10, 1840.

As soon as the journal had been read,

Mr. STANLY, after some remarks in relation to the expense of printing, etc. moved to reconsider the vote by which, on yesterday, the following resolution, offered by Mr. AHERTON, was adopted, for the purpose of submitting an amendment reducing the number of copies:

Resolved, That the Message of the President of the United States be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that fifteen thousand copies thereof with the accompanying documents, and five thousand copies thereof without the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the members of the House.

Mr. AHERTON said that he found, on referring to the journal of 1838-9, that fifteen thousand of the Message with, and five thousand without, the accompanying documents, had been ordered to be printed. In introducing the resolution, he did not know it was a departure from the former usage of the House. Last year a mistake was committed, and there was not a sufficient supply of the Message, with the accompanying documents, printed.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said the documents were of more importance than the message without the documents, and were sought for as conveying more information. Mr. T. thought that, at the last session, the usual rule was departed from, and a large number of the President's Message was printed without the documents. The reason was asked by his constituents, who were desirous of seeing the documents as well as the message.

Mr. CUSHING said the consideration suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina was a serious one. For his part he could not say what the maximum expenses of the printing would be, nor did he know the character of the documents; and such being the case, he hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail, in order that he and other gentlemen, who were not present when the resolution was adopted, might have an opportunity of giving their views.

Mr. C. demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 89, nays 90.

So the motion was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN,

Ordered, That the several Standing Committees be now appointed, according to the standing rules and orders of the House.

With a view of affording the SPEAKER time for appointing the Standing Committees, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, it was Resolved, That when this House adjourn, it adjourn to meet again on Monday next.

Mr. ADAMS offered the following resolution; which was read for information:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed, with liberty to send for persons and papers, to ascertain and report to this House whether the printed House document of the last session, No. 185, has been falsified; materially differing from the manuscript document transmitted by the President of the United States; and if so, by whom the said falsification was made.

Mr. A. after an explanation of the nature of the document, (which is a translation from the Spanish of the papers relating to the African negroes of the Amistad, observed that his object in offering the resolution was, first, that justice might be done to the President of the United States, and to the officer employed as translator in the State Department; and, second, that it might, if possible, be ascertained by whom the fraud had been perpetrated, if it should prove to be a fraud, and not a blunder. He then went on to argue that this erroneous translation would have a very important bearing on the case of the negroes in question, whose trial would come on in the Supreme Court in January, inasmuch as the fraudulent translation of the passport would make them out as slaves, whereas the proper translation would show that they were free men.

Mr. A. after reading copious extracts from a pamphlet on the subject by Judge W. Jay, of New York, concluded by expressing a hope that the resolution would be adopted forthwith.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution; and it was agreed to, as follows—ayes 87, noes 46.

On motion of Mr. CRANSTON, it was Resolved, That all petitions and memorials presented to this House at the last session of Congress, and referred to the several standing committees, on which no report was made, or in relation to which bills were reported which were lost in either House, may be again referred to the same committees, at the pleasure of the members by whom they were respectively presented, on being handed, or a list thereof presented, to the Clerk.

Mr. DUNCAN gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, or some subsequent day of the session, ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the naturalization laws.

Mr. HAND gave notice that to-morrow, (or the earliest opportunity,) he should ask leave to introduce a bill establishing a uniform system of naturalization, and repealing all the present laws on that subject, similar to the one heretofore introduced by him.

Mr. CALVARY MORRIS gave notice that, on to-morrow, or some subsequent day during the present session, he would ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal "An act, entitled, 'an act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue,'" approved July 4, 1840.

On motion of Mr. JENIFER,

Resolved, that a Select Committee on the Tobacco Trade be appointed by the SPEAKER.

Mr. TILLINGHAST submitted the following, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House how far, and in what manner, the act passed at the last session, entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," has been carried into execution; whether any buildings, additions to, or alterations in, buildings therein authorized or required, have been commenced; at what cost, or contracts therefor made, or orders therefor given, and the terms and conditions of such contracts and orders; what number of clerks, special agents, and other officers, agents, or servants, have been and now are employed under the provisions of said act, or for aid in carrying the same into effect, and where, and from what times, and at what compensations; whether each and every of the officers who are therein required to give bond have given bond, and the sum, sureties, and time of delivery of each bond; and who, if any, have not given bond; whether, in the collection, or keeping, or transfer, or disbursement of the public revenue, or any portion thereof, since said act has been in force, any bank have been resorted to; and, if so, what bank or banks, to what extent and in what manner, and what propositions have been made, if any, to any bank therefor; and setting forth, also, in what specific manner, whether gold or silver, or notes or certificates, or other and what evidences of deposit or credit, all or any of the revenue has been collected or actually passed from the hands of the person or persons from whom the same was due, to the hands of the officer or officers charged with the immediate collection thereof, since said act has been in force; distinguishing, as nearly as may be, how much has been so collected and paid in each specific matter or medium of payment; also, setting forth how, and in what places or offices, and under what actual and personal custody or keeping, all and any and each portion of the revenue, moneys, and assurances, or evidences of debt or obligation, have been kept during said time; and how, and by what agencies and aid, and what forms and process, and on what terms, conditions, and cost of exchange or transfer, and in what specific matter, whether gold and silver, or notes or certificates, or other and what evidences, all, and any portions thereof, have been in said time disbursed and transferred.

The SPEAKER laid before the House—

1. A communication from the Solicitor of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 30th of April, 1840, asking whether there was any failure on the part of the United States in the fulfilment of a contract entered into on the 29th day of July, 1834, by the commissioners on the part of the United States for building a custom-house in the city of New York.

2. The annual report of the Clerk of the House in relation to the contingent fund.

3. A communication from the Navy Department, enclosing statements showing the expenditures on account of the contingent expenses of the offices of the Secretary of the Navy and the Navy Commissioners from the 30th day of September, 1839, to the 30th day of September, 1840, prepared and transmitted in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress, approved 9th May, 1836.

All of which, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following message was transmitted to the House by the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7, 1840.

SIR: I herewith transmit a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the Navy Pension fund, to which the attention of Congress is invited, and recommend an immediate appropriation of $151,352 39 to meet the payment of pensions becoming due on and after the 1st of January, 1841.

M. VAN BUREN.

Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER,

Speaker of House of Representatives.

The Hon. HENRY M. BRECKENRIDGE of Pennsylvania, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. RICHARD BIDDLE, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat. On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,

The House adjourned, to meet again on Monday next.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, December 14, 1840.

Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. PRESTON, Mr. SOUTHARD, and Mr. WILLIAMS, appeared in their places in the Senate this morning.

Griffin, were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; and the petition and papers of Joel Parks and of Catharine Parks and of Catharine White, were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of citizens of Jefferson county, N. Y. praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of Hannah F. Perrine, widow of Dr. Henry Perrine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petition of Hannah Lefferts; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WHITE presented the memorial of the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, the petition of Robert Arheart; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana gave notice that tomorrow he would ask leave to introduce bills of the following titles:

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Col. Francis Vigo;

A bill to regulate the land offices in the State of Indiana, and for other purposes;

A bill to authorize the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad Company to enter on a credit a quantity of land, to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the following resolution, which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate statements showing the quantity of land reported by the registers and receivers of the several land offices, in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 25th April, 1838, to have been unsold in their respective districts on the 30th day of June, 1838, after having been offered at the minimum price per acre, discriminating between the several land districts; what proportion of the land so unsold on that day consisted of first rate land, and what was unfit for cultivation, according to the reports of the said officers; what was their estimate of the average value per acre of the said unsold land; and what part of the said land so remaining unsold on the 30th June, 1838, aforesaid, has been since sold, and at what price, discriminating between the amount sold in each of the districts. And the Secretary is further directed to cause parallel columns to be prepared, exhibiting in one connected view the quantity of land unsold on the day aforesaid in each district, the amount since sold, the value as assessed or estimated by the said officers, and the prices at which the lands have since actually sold; and the aggregate value of the land as assessed, and the aggregate amount of the sales made since the 30th June, 1838, in each land district.

Mr. CLAY also presented the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," ought to be forthwith repealed; and that the Committee on Finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that so much of the President's message as relates to the finances of the country be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEBSTER hoped that the resolution might be permitted to lie on the table for a day or two. The part of the message referred to relates to a subject of high importance, and it might be useful at an early period of the session for gentlemen to express their opinions on that important subject. It was his opinion that some notice ought to be taken of it by those who differ from the opinions of the President, and that they should express their opinion at an early day; but a few days he desired for its consideration. Again, another document—the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury—had but this morning been laid upon the table, and therefore, if the gentleman [Mr. Wright] would consent, he should desire that the resolution should be withdrawn, and renewed again on Wednesday.

Mr. WRIGHT could not see what necessity existed for adopting the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, as the mere reference of the message to a committee of this body could interpose no obstacle to the discussion of any and every part of it. He was but pursuing the usual course; and as he considered it his duty to make and press the motion, he could not consent to withdraw it. But it was in the hands of the Senate, and to the decision of the Senate he should leave it.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved that the motion be postponed until Wednesday next; which was carried—ayes 20, noes 19.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, so much of the President's message as relates to military affairs was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, so much of the President's Message as relates to foreign affairs was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. FULTON, so much of the President's message as relates to the public lands, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, so much of the President's message as relates to naval affairs, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. NORVELL, so much of the President's message as relates to commerce, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. WALL, so much of the President's message as relates to the judiciary, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, so much of the President's message as relates to Indian affairs, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

Agreeably to the notice given when the Senate was last in session, Mr. BENTON rose to ask leave to bring in a bill for the establishment of a permanent prospective pre-emption law in favor of settlers on the public lands, and prefaced his motion for the leave he was about to ask, with some remarks upon the character of the bill he proposed to introduce, the appropriateness of the present time for bringing it forward, the general utility of the pre-emption system, and the public expectation to see it now permanently established. He said that the pre-emption laws heretofore passed were temporary in their duration, and retrospective in their operation: they were only made to include settlers up to a limited day, and to remain in force for a limited period. The latest act of this kind was passed on the 30th day of June last, and only included the settlers to that day. The subsequent settlers received no benefit from that act: they were now without protection from law; and it was unjust and unequal to make any distinction between the settlers before and since that day. All were equally entitled to legislative protection, and so would be all future settlers; and instead of extending this protection from time to time, by temporary and limited laws, it was just and proper to provide for all cases at once, the future as well as the existing cases; by establishing a permanent prospective pre-emption system, to operate regularly and uniformly in all time to come.

This, said Mr. B. has always been the object of the friends of the pre-emption laws; they always looked to a permanent system; and considered the temporary acts which were passed as merely stepping-stones and entering-wedges to the main object. This has been constantly expressed, and sometimes attempted; and the auspicious moment for a successful effort, so long desired, seems now to have arrived. All parties are now in favor of the policy which leads to the permanent pre-emptive system. The summer of 1840, and the Presidential canvass which has just terminated, has produced, or developed, a unanimity of sentiment on this desirable point. The actual President (Mr. Van Buren) has long been in favor of this policy, and has so expressed himself in repeated messages to Congress; the President elect (General Harrison) is represented to be favorable to it also, and has had the benefit of that representation in the late Presidential canvass; the Democracy are the known advocates of pre-emptions, and fought them up, in many hard contested actions, to victory and popularity; the Federalists, long their enemy, have now seen the error of their ways, and have become the foremost supporters of the policy they had opposed. The poor man, and his synonyme, the log-cabin: have become the absorbing objects, and the burning themes, of their love and eloquence. They celebrate them in all forms, and wear the sign of the cabin in every article of dress and furniture. Now the cabin, the poor man, and the pre-emption, go together; and he that loves one, must love the other. The triple affections go together; and in these affections the Federalists of 1840 have shown themselves to be most deeply immersed. The gentlemen of this party have betaken themselves to the love of log cabins, and all their paraphernalia, with the fury and incontinence of a sudden and romantic affection. They build them with their own hands, and piously dedicate them—they sing, dance, drink, and speak in them—they attend them day and night—they decorate them with appropriate trappings, with gourds, corn skins, buck horns, beaver traps, and whatever else denotes the real cabin of the poor man, and the pre-emptioner—they devote themselves to the service of these rude edifices with a zeal unknown to the degeneracy of modern times. Like Pygmalion, they become madly enamored of the work of their own hands, and deliver up their lives to the enjoyment of its contemplation.

Mr. B. said it would be inexcusable in the friends of the pre-emption system not to take advantage of this favorable conjunction of parties and circumstances, to press the interests of the real inhabitants of the log cabins—the frontier men of the new States and Territories—whose enterprise lays open the wilderness, whose courage protects the infant settlements, and whose labor reflects value upon the national domain. This is the man whose toil demands our protection. He builds a cabin, not in the city, but in the woods; not with music and feasting, and crowded help, but solitary and alone, and with privation of every thing which could give joy to the task. He proceeds upon hope!—upon the hope that the rude tenement which he builds may be his own! that the secluded spot which he has selected may become his! that no heartless speculator may come to rob him of both! In a word, he hopes that a pre-emption law may be passed! Now, said Mr. B. let us help this lonely and meritorious man: let us help him to build his log cabin: let us give courage to his heart, strength to his arm, and comfort to his spirit, by securing to him the pre-emptive right to the soil on which he builds. It is all he asks; and while our great cities—even this metropolis, and all the capitals and commercial emporiums of all the States—still retain the evidences of Federal love for log cabins; while these erections, so lately put up, still retain their unusual position in public squares, and on magnificent streets, side by side with the splendid mansion which no longer disdains its humble companion: while all this still exists, and still salutes our eyes, and while the proud architects of these city cabins are still here, on this floor, to legislate among us, let us extend our regard to the cabin in the woods, and grant to its inhabitant the only favor which he solicits—that of protection from the speculator, in the house which he has built, in the field which he has cleared, and in the soil which he cultivates.

Mr. B. then offered his bill, which was read as follows:

A BILL to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, every head of a family, every widow, and every single man over the age of eighteen years, who shall make a settlement on any of the public lands to which the Indian title has been, or shall be, extinguished, whether the same be surveyed or not, or who may have settled on such land since the 30th day of June, 1840, and who shall inhabit and improve the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of one quarter section, to be paid for at the minimum price of such land at the time of paying for the same.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That where the improvement and the settlement shall be on different quarter sections, the settler shall make choice of the quarter he will take, provided it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That where the quantity of one hundred and sixty acres cannot be obtained in one entire quarter section, the deficiency may be made up out of any contiguous vacant ground.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in the execution of this act, and in making up the quantity of one hundred and sixty acres where the same cannot be had entire, the entries may be made in tracts of eighty acres, or forty acres, or in fractions; and where the fraction shall be more than the quantity required to complete the pre-emption, the excess shall be paid for, and the pre-emptive right shall extend to the whole fraction.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That where two or more persons shall have settled on the same quarter section, the same shall be divided between them, and the deficiency made up to each out of contiguous vacant ground: but no wilful intruder on the known rights of another shall be entitled to any benefit under this section.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, All legal reservations of public lands for any purpose whatever shall be exempted from the operation of this act, so that no right of pre-emption shall accrue on any such reserves.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all questions in relation to pre-emption claims, or between claimants to the same quarter section, shall be settled summarily and definitively by the Register and Receiver of the district, under the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The bill having been read,

Mr. BENTON said as the session was a short one and did not afford time for the courtesy usually extended upon the introduction of bills, he hoped it would be waived in the present instance, and that each Senator would vote upon the question of its second reading in accordance with his opinion of the merits of the bill; and he would ask the yeas and nays upon ordering it to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD wished to look into the bill before he was called upon to vote either for or against it, and hoped that the Senator from Missouri would permit it to be postponed until to-morrow and printed; which was agreed to, and the bill ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....2ND SESS.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1840.

VOLUME 9.....No. 2.

BY BLAIR & RIVES.

—WEEKLY—

PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

FOR INQUIRY INTO THE ALLEGED FALSIFICATION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENT NO. 185 OF LAST SESSION RELATIVE TO THE AFRICANS TAKEN ON BOARD THE AMISTAD.

Mr. Adams, Mr. Medill,
McKay, Dennis,
Barnard,

Mr. WINTHROP of Massachusetts stated that, on examining the list of yeas and nays on the vote taken, last week, on the motion of Mr. STANLY to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of Mr. ATHERTON, for the printing of the usual number of copies of the President's Annual Message had been adopted, he discovered that his name was omitted.

Mr. JOSEPH L. WILLIAMS stated that he also was present, and voted in the affirmative, when the question on the motion to reconsider was taken, but his name was not recorded.

Whereupon,

Mr. WINTHROP moved that the yeas given by Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS and himself, on Thursday last, on the question of reconsidering the vote for printing certain extra copies of the President's Message, be now entered upon the journal, it appearing that the same was omitted at the time.

Mr. PETRIKIN was inclined to question the propriety of permitting members to have their votes inserted on the journal at so long a time after the decision had been announced. He thought members ought to remain in their places, and listen whether their names had been omitted or not, so as to have the error rectified at the time.

After some debate on the propriety of permitting the votes to be recorded, in which Messrs. STANLY, TILLINGHAST, WISE, LEWIS WILLIAMS, and CUSHING, participated, the motion to insert was agreed to by the following vote: yeas 200, nays 3.

The SPEAKER then stated that the addition just made of two votes in the affirmative, would reverse the decision of Wednesday last, by which the motion of Mr. STANLY to reconsider the resolution of Mr. ATHERTON, was rejected. That resolution was, therefore, reconsidered, and its merits consequently open to debate.

Mr. STANLY then moved to amend the resolution by inserting 15,000 of the President's message without, and 5,000 with, the accompanying documents.

Mr. DUNCAN inquired whether the order to print had been executed.

The SPEAKER replied that it had not.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, by way of compromise, moved further to amend by substituting 5,000 of the message with, and 5,000 without, the accompanying documents.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and decided in the negative.

The question being then on the amendment of Mr. STANLY,

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend the amendment by substituting 10,000 with, and 5,000 without, the documents.

Mr. BEATTY thereupon called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 110, nays 96, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Barnard, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Breckenridge, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calloun, Carr, Carroll, Clifford, Coley, Connor, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cranston, Cray, Crockett, Cross, Dana, Davee, Dennis, Dickerson, Dean, Doe, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Everett, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Formance, Gaibraith, Garland, Gorry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hubbard, Jackson, Jamies, Jameson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kempshall, Kille, Lane, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McClure, McCalloch, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Ogle, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pope, Prentiss, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Saltonstall, Samuels, Shaw, Slade, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Strong, Stuart, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Boardman, Boits, Brewster, Brockway, Wm. B. Campbell, Carier, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, Floyd, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, George W. Hopkins, Hunt, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Leadbetter, Lincoln, McKay, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Newhard, Osborne, Palen, Parrish, Peck, Petrikin, Pickens, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Rives, Russell, Shepard, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Sumpter, Swearingen, Sweeney, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, John B. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—96.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question being on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. STANLY as amended, it was decided in the affirmative.

And the question then being on the adoption of the resolution as amended, it was agreed to without a count.

So ten thousand copies of the President's message with, and five thousand copies without, the accompanying documents, were ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF MR. ANDERSON OF KENTUCKY.

Mr. THOMPSON of Kentucky rose and announced to the House that SIMEON H. ANDERSON, his predecessor in this Congress from the Fifth District in Kentucky, had departed this life, at his residence in Garrard county, since the last session. Mr. T. remarked that his death was a public calamity, because the country, in the morning of his life, and as his career of usefulness upon a new theatre had just commenced, had been deprived of one of her most promising sons. In the councils of his native State, he had rendered services to that State, and achieved for himself an enviable reputation; without opposition, and by the undivided suffrage of his district, he had been returned a member for this Congress. His bearing as a gentleman was a true evidence of the moral worth and integrity of purpose that characterized the man. His brief services here had not fully manifested to this body the rich attainments and high order of intellect that, combined with his private virtue, had secured to him not only public confidence at home, but also that respect and attachment which all the better sympathies of social life ever accord to merit and worth. The bar of which he was a member and an ornament, in his native State, regret his untimely death; his district feels the loss. Allied with the best blood of the State, he has left a young family to mourn the sad bereavement of a kind parent and an affectionate husband. Mr. T. presented the following resolutions as a token of condolence to that family, and as the last kind office and tribute of respect we can pay to the memory of one who yet lives in the cherished remembrances and affections of his friends, his relatives, and of the State of which he was a favorite child, and on whom she rested high and proud hopes of future usefulness and eminence. There is allotted to but few a better and brighter fortune than seemed to await him. The sentiment that "they whom the gods love die young" was a tender delusion of heathen superstition, in this instance, he trusted, but exemplified and adopted by a wise and mysterious dispensation of the Christian's Providence. The malediction, "May you die from home," was an imprecation he had no enemy malevolent enough to utter, and he now reposes as he lived and died, surrounded by his household and friends.

Resolved, That this House with deep regret have heard the announcement of the death of SIMEON H. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, late a member of this Congress.

Resolved, That to testify their regard for the deceased, and as an evidence of the sympathy they feel, and hereby tender to his surviving relatives, they will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, As a further testimony of respect for the deceased, that when this House adjourn to-day, it adjourn to to-morrow.

DEATH OF MR. RAMSEY, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. LEET then rose, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: In accordance with a practice which has been sanctioned by long usage, I rise to discharge a painful duty; in doing which I feel sure the House will sympathize with me. I rise, sir, to announce the death of WILLIAM STERRETT RAMSEY, who was a distinguished member of the Pennsylvania delegation, and represented the Cumberland district. He died suddenly in October last, in the city of Baltimore, somewhat remote from the bosom of his near relatives, but where, however, there were not wanting friends to show appropriate marks of respect to his memory. His death was not less sudden than melancholy. From early infancy he was afflicted with feeble health, and a weak constitution.

Having been called by the people of his district to serve them in the National Legislature of his native country, and desirous to execute the trust reposed in him, he struggled through the last unusually arduous and exciting session, in the discharge of his duties, in a manner alike honorable to himself, gratifying to his friends, and satisfactory to his constituents. At the close of the session, he found his constitution rapidly yielding to the ravages of a confirmed consumption; and during the recess of Congress, in the youth of his days, with the fairest earthly prospects before him, (could he have lived to realize them,) and at a time when one would think he might be buoyant with hope, he sunk a victim to gloomy melancholy, leaving numerous devoted friends to lament his premature and deplorable death. I have never been able to feel fully the propriety of panegyric on occasions like this—it excites little or no interest where the subject of it is unknown, and cannot reach his ear, nor enhance his character in the esteem of those who knew his goodness, his talents, and his virtues. I may be indulged, however, in simply saying, that Mr. Ramsey, as a man, was liberal and kind; and, as a friend, was true and faithful: he enjoyed the advantages of an accomplished education received in this country, and he visited some of the most famous places in Europe in the anxious pursuit of knowledge, and for the improvement of his health. Some time after his return from Europe, he was in 1838 elected to the 26th Congress, and in 1840 was again returned by a generous and enlightened constituency to the 27th Congress. But, alas! he is now no more—he died a high minded and honorable man.

Without making further remarks, I ask the House to pay the customary tribute of respect to the memory of a deceased member, by adopting the resolutions which I hold in my hand, and now send to the Chair.

Resolved, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of WILLIAM STREBETT RAMSEY, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate statements showing the quantity of land reported by the registers and receivers of the several land offices, in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 25th April, 1828, to have been unsold in their respective districts on the 30th day of June, 1828, after having been offered at the minimum price per acre, discriminating between the several land districts; what proportion of the land so unsold on that day consisted of first rate land, and what was unfit for cultivation, according to the reports of the said officers; what was their estimate of the average value per acre of the said unsold land; and what part of the said land so remaining unsold on the 30th June, 1828, aforesaid, has been since sold, and at what price, discriminating between the amount sold in each of the districts. And the Secretary is further directed to cause parallel columns to be prepared, exhibiting in one connected view the quantity of land unsold on the day aforesaid in each district, the amount since sold, the value as assessed or estimated by the said officers, and the prices at which the lands have since actually sold; and the aggregate value of the land as assessed, and the aggregate amount of the sales made since the 30th June, 1828, in each land district.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama offered the following amendments:

Resolved further, That said Secretary cause to be exhibited in the report aforesaid, such alterations as may have been made in the several land districts embraced by said reports made pursuant to the said resolution of the Senate of the 25th of April, 1828—showing in what instances, and to what extent, said districts have been enlarged or diminished since the said 30th day of June, 1828; and also what new lands, then embraced by said several districts, have since been sold.

Resolved further, That said Secretary cause to be communicated statements showing in separate columns the quantity of public land which has been offered for sale at public auction, and has remained unsold at the minimum price, in each State and Territory for a period of five years, and less than ten years; the quantity so offered and remaining unsold for ten years and less than fifteen years; the quantity so offered and remaining unsold for fifteen years and less than twenty years; the quantity so offered and remaining unsold for more than twenty and less than thirty years; and the quantity which has been so offered and has remained unsold for more than thirty years: showing the aggregate at the foot of each column, and the general aggregate of all the lands which have been offered, and have remained unsold for five years and upwards, up to the latest returns.

The amendments were agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

REPEAL OF THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY LAW.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, was taken up for consideration, viz:

Resolved, That the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," ought to be forthwith repealed; and that the Committee on Finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. CLAY said it was no part of his purpose, in offering his resolution, to invite or partake in an argument on any question that might arise out of the great measure to which the resolution relates. It was, then, no purpose on his part to enter into any argument. He would as lief argue to a convicted criminal, with a rope round his neck, and the cart about to leave his body, to prove to him that his conviction was according to law and justice, as to prove that this Sub-Treasury measure ought to be abandoned. He had brought forward the resolution in the shape in which he had presented it to the Senate, because he thought it was his duty so to do. The ordinary course of legislation—the usual practice, he was aware, in repealing existing laws—was to move a resolution of instruction, addressed to a committee, and directing an inquiry into the expediency of the measure, or to ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the measure which it was wished to get rid of. But there were occasions when that ordinary form, he presumed, might, and ought to be dispensed with. If they looked for examples to the only period which bears any analogy to that which exists at this moment—he meant the period of 1800, when Jefferson came into power, but under circumstances far different, and in a contest more equal and of doubtful issue than that which has brought the present men into power—if they looked back to that period, and saw the alien law, not limited and temporal, but of permanent duration—could they not suppose that it would have been idle and ridiculous to move a resolution of inquiry as to the expediency of repealing that most odious measure? But respecting this Sub-Treasury, about which they had had about three years and three months' argument—a period longer than the last war with Great Britain, and half as great as the war of the Revolution—under these circumstances, discussion of the measure would seem to be unnecessary and misplaced; it was sufficient for him to say that the nation wills the repeal of the measure—the nation decrees the repeal of the measure—the nation commands the repeal of the measure—and the representatives of nineteen States were sent there instructed to repeal it. They might dispute about what was or was not involved in the issue of the late Presidential contest; they might contend that that contest affirmed this or that principle or measure, and they might dispute about it: he knew it was the practice of gentlemen to whom it was his misfortune to be opposed in that Senate, after elections, to contend that this election sanctions this or puts down that measure, and that election demonstrates that the people are in favor of this and opposed to that measure, whether Sub-Treasury or a United States Bank, and there might be a controversy about the matter; but on one point it was impossible there could be diversity of opinion, either here or elsewhere; and that is, that this nation, by one of the most tremendous majorities ever given in our nation's annals, whatever else it may have decided, has decided against this Sub-Treasury measure. And when the nation speaks—when the nation wills—when the nation commands, what is to be done? There was no necessity to go through the form of referring to a committee to inquire into the expediency of doing what the public sentiment required. What Senator would stand there in his place and say he opposed himself to the will of the nation?

He, for one, had hoped that the President of the United States, in the message which he had communicated at the commencement of the session, with a magnanimity which would have becoming, would have announced the fact of this will of the nation, and recommended a conformity to it. Let him not be misunderstood. He would not ask the President—no, he had too much personal respect for him; he had too much regard for human nature, to ask the President to come here and say to Congress, "I have been wrong all this time; the measure which I have urged upon you for adoption is one that was founded in error." No; it would be unmanly; he (Mr. CLAY) could not expect it at his hands; but he did expect the President would have said what the fact was; that he would have admitted that the nation had decided against his favorite measure; and that he would have recommended submission to the will of the nation; but least of all did he expect a recommendation and improvement; and that the Secretary of the Treasury should concur in the recommendation of amendment and improvement of a measure against which the nation had decided, which both the Executive and the Secretary knew. But if they disregard the will of the nation prior to the 4th of March next, they knew well that it would not endure longer than a Congress could convene, and a new President could act on the measure.

But a word as to the effect of a repeal of this measure. What is the effect of the operation of the present Sub-Treasury system? It was said to be very successful. This was announced in the message, and repeated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He should, however, have been pleased if those documents had gone into details respecting the operation of this measure, showing how it had altered the business and the relations of the country, and the receipts and disbursements of the revenue. But so far, it was said it had satisfied all their expectations, and was in successful operation. Now he (Mr. CLAY) thanked God he was far removed from any one of the Receivers General—may he wished he was farther removed; but he should be glad to know where had been its successful operation. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] might communicate the information. He should be glad to learn how it had successfully operated, from that illustrious Senator who had ably and eloquently defended the Secretary of the Treasury on all occasions; and he must say that it was a most ungrateful return for those services to treat him as he had been treated at a recent election for United States Senator for the State of New Hampshire. He should be glad, however, to learn from him [Mr. HUBBARD] and from the gentleman who was at the head of the Committee on Finance, in detail, what had been the operation of this Sub-Treasury system—how it was acting—how it was working—how it was varying the financial and commercial and manufacturing affairs of the country. He would tell them what he understood it to be, though he was separated from many of these Receivers General. He understood that there was not the slightest difference prevailing now, from what, before the 4th of July last, was the system in operation. He understood that now, as then, the notes of all the specie paying banks were received by the collector and transmitted to the Receivers General. He understood the process was this: A merchant of New York has a large sum to pay—say $100; well, he gives a check to a specie paying bank—he pays no money, but the check is endorsed specie—and he gives another check with no endorsement whatever; both are carried to the bank, and are carried to the credit—true, not of the Government—but of the Receiver General in his private account, as a private transaction. Well, they all knew, whatever might be endorsed on the check for $100 or $300, that they were both cash paper, convertible into specie, and this was the usage prior to the 4th of July last; and the paper of no bank which did not pay specie was received by the collector of the public revenue, but the paper of banks paying specie was. It is now received, and it was so received before the 4th of July, taking New York as an example for illustration. The revenue, when collected by the collector, was paid into the bank to the account of Jesse Hoyt—to his private account, over which the Government had no control—and now he passed it over to Paul or Saul Allen, who had also an account with the bank, over which the Government had no control or direction. Well, then, the whole revenue of the United States, amounting to nineteen millions, according to the estimates of the current and the next year, but thirteen millions as actually received during the present year—the whole revenue of the United States, at some time or other, passed through the hands and was kept in the custody of private individuals who stood credited for the amount on the books of some bank or banks to which they had resort. Well then, if he were not mistaken, it was very clear the operation of the system so far, had been exceedingly limited, and in the event of a repeal, which was proposed in that resolution, the result would be that the administration of the Treasury Department will revert back to the state of things prior to the 4th of July, or rather it will continue the same state of things which yet existed, without interfering with the financial affairs of the Government. He hoped for another result, should he succeed in obtaining a concurrence with his resolution—he hoped that an account would be opened, as in olden times, as in safe times, and in times of regular administration of the Government, with the Treasurer of the United States. But he contended that, whatever inconveniences could result from a repeal of the measure, that was no consideration for them. Their duty was marked out by the public opinion, and, for one, he was disposed to obey its instruction which, to nineteen States of this Union, had been given.

He would not enter further into a discussion of the subject; he would content himself with those observations, and he was not disposed to urge others to a general expression of opinion; but if they could doubt—if they wanted further time to consider whether they were acting here as trustees of a great community, or were giving a mere expression of their own opinions—if, indeed, they wanted time for any purpose, he should be the last to deny a request so reasonable as that.

Mr. WRIGHT said he came from one of the nineteen States alluded to by the Senator from Kentucky, and he was happy to say to that Senator that he rejoiced to find it was the disposition of the party about to come into power to make precisely the issue tendered by this resolution. He thanked that Senator, therefore—as he would have done yesterday when the resolution was presented, had it been proper—for preventing that proposition to them. He could say to that Senator, that for one—and perhaps he could say it with more propriety than any other member of that body—he did not desire further to discuss that measure either before the Senate or the country; he could only say, that when the Senate was called upon to act upon the proposition, he was desirous that it should be with an understanding of what it is, and that the Senate might be as full as may be, consistent with the attendance of members in the city. To-day he did not desire to act upon it, for one Senator now in town, was sick and not able to be in his place; and another left town after the last adjournment of the Senate prior to yesterday, with the confident expectation of returning last evening, who had not yet resumed his seat; but if there was a disposition in the Senate to act upon the resolution, and make an expression which would not mislead the public mind, he should desire that expression to be made now, and upon this resolution. It would be a work of supererogation, in a short session like this, to pass the resolution, and instruct a committee to report a bill for the proposed repeal, without any expectation that the bill would meet the approbation of the Senate. Hence he wished that all the members in attendance might be present when the vote should be taken. But he could not excuse himself if he allowed the opportunity to pass without some slight reference to the remarks of the Senator by whom the resolution had been introduced. That Senator had become deeply impressed with the result of the late election; and on the point whether it was or was not a full and free and fair expression of the popular will, he (Mr. WRIGHT) did not stand there to express an opinion. He would merely call to the honorable Senator's mind that they had just passed through the first election under this Government, when principles on the part of the dominant party were not declared, when measures were not avowed, and when men stood before the country, not to proclaim to the people their principles and measures, but to apologize for saying nothing in reference to their measures or the policy which they proposed to adopt. That being the case, the Senate would pardon him for calling their attention to the fact, that he, and other Senators who had sat there with him from 1832 and 1833 to the present time, had seen election after election, when it was the fashion of candidates and of parties to avow their principles, and had heard the honorable Senator, with an ingenuity which cannot be surpassed, parry the issue his (Mr. WRIGHT's) friends had made, and contend, almost with success, that nothing was prejudged by the popular voice in those popular elections. Take the very measure which it was now proposed to repeal, and what was the judgment of the people, and what was the public expression at the Congressional elections of 1838 and 1839? Then, if ever, a distinct issue or proposition was presented to the people of this country. That was the issue that was pending during the war of more than three years' duration, of which the honorable Senator had spoken—that was the only point in controversy; and what was the result? There was a popular branch of the National Legislature unfavorable to this measure in 1837 and 1838, and was returned in its place in 1838 and 1839, favorable to it; and it was adopted in pursuance of a pronouncement of the will of the people of this country, pending the controversy as to the measure itself. That popular mind may have changed—it may be different now; but if it be, and if the pronouncement of the popular opinion has been against the Independent Treasury, of what measure, as a substitute, has it been in favor? Has the pronouncement of the late election declared the popular voice of the country to be in favor of a National Bank? Will the Senator contend that it was so, and will his party assume it? Or has it declared in favor of the policy of another political party, and a return to the system of State bank deposits? Would the honorable Senator admit that? He (Mr. WRIGHT) did not say the honorable Senator would admit either or both; but he had a right to ask the question.

But the Senator says the result of the late election has been a triumphant pronouncement against this measure. How is it ascertained? By what declaration of policy or principle on the part of that party which has become predominant? Why, he should suppose—and he made the remark without intending disrespect any where—if the result of the late election could be claimed as proving any thing, it was to prove that they were to take down the splendid edifice in which he then stood, and erect a log cabin in its place—that instead of the rich draperies and valuable pictures before them, they were to hang around their chamber coon skins, cat skins, and other trophies of the chase. But the Senator does not claim such to be our duties, resulting from the late expression of the popular will. No, such is not, and has not been, the result of the pronouncement of the will of the freemen of this country; and yet, could they not prove such conclusions with double force and double testimony over that which the honorable Senator seeks now to establish—the condemnation of the Sub-Treasury measure? And yet they were called upon to be silent, to submit, and to obey this foregone decree. Against the popular pronouncement made at the late elections, he should not intentionally utter one word—the decision of the people he should respect; for they were yet, thank God; the highest tribunal known to our country and her institutions. When the powers which that election has brought into existence shall constitutionally take their places, he should be one of those who, whether as a private citizen or in the high position in which he then stood, would be found ready to render a constitutional submission; but he was not ready to admit that, in rendering its verdict, the popular voice had pronounced its decision against this measure; or if it had, that it had decided in favor of any other measure in its place. What, then, was the argument of the gentleman in favor of this precipitate repeal? Was it that the measure was doing mischief to the country, and was working evil to the people? He (Mr. WRIGHT) did not understand him to say so. It was that it was not carried out in its terms and spirit—that the law was not observed, but that it was violated by the officers appointed under it. Well, the honorable Senator might be right, for he (Mr. WRIGHT) had not that acquaintance with banking institutions which would enable him to pronounce on the fact. If that were so, however, did it follow that the law must be repealed, because the law was not observed? And should they expect from the honorable Senator that mode of getting rid of a salutary law which was not executed? Should not, rather, an inquiry be instituted to ascertain whether the officers did discharge their duty? He knew not what the fact might be any where, but he confessed it would have pleased him better if the honorable gentleman had consented to take Philadelphia, instead of New York, as an example; and he knew the New York banks were specie paying banks; and he knew it was the constructive duty of the Receiver General to receive three-fourths of the revenue there in the notes of specie paying banks; but does the Philadelphia Receiver General take checks upon non-specie paying banks? And if the Receiver General of New York, instead of compelling the merchants to bring specie to his vaults, takes a certified check that is payable in specie, and presents it for payment himself, is the law violated, or is the community injured? What, then, is the argument? Why, that there had been but little salutary influence from the practical operation of this law, and therefore it was better to repeal it. Repeal it for what? To take the revenues out of the reach of Congress, and place them again where they had virtually been since the suspension of the banks in 1837, until the passage of the law—in the hands of the Executive? Will it be better to put them exclusively in Executive hands, or to keep them within the power and provisions of a law, even if it does not suit the Senator, until a better system can be devised? What is the course of wisdom, and what has been the popular voice in the matter? But he was going further than he had intended, and therefore he should suspend further remark. He did not desire to foreclose the debate by a motion to postpone now, but when the Senate came to act upon this resolution, he desired that the decision should be the sense of the Senate, and of as full a Senate as the attendance of members of the Senate in the city would permit. For the present he would only ask that the vote be taken by ayes and noes.

Mr. CLAY was not particularly desirous to press this measure until Senators were on the floor, and he should have great pleasure to concur in any reasonable suggestion of the Senator from New York. But while he was up, he would ask the gentleman from New York, who charged upon the party which had obtained the predominance, that they had no known principles, whether that gentleman desired to know his (Mr. CLAY's) principles, or the principles of the friends with whom he was associated? Did he desire to know their opinions with respect to this Sub-Treasury measure? Why, had they not been battling, with the whole country coming to their aid, against this identical measure? Had the Senator any difficulty in guessing that the party coming into power, when it assumed the reins of government, would put aside this measure? The Senator told them that at one time an apparent popular expression in favor of the measure, in 1838 and 1839—that a popular majority sanctioned the measure—and that it was finally carried in the popular branch of Congress. He hoped the honorable Senator would relieve him from the necessity of looking into the New Jersey affair. He need not enter into the consideration of the composition of the majority in the other House when the Sub-Treasury was passed; but who amongst them, who had attended to the progress of events during the election of 1840, could doubt that the public opinion was against it? The honorable Senator had called upon them to declare what would be their measures after this Sub-Treasury was destroyed? Whether it would be a Bank of the United States, or whether it would be a system in connection with the local banks? Why, sufficient for the day is the evil thereof; they had now nothing but the Sub-Treasury to handle, and that was sufficient for them. Let them remove that out of the way, and then those coming into power would bring forward their measures, and then it would be time for the distinguished Senator from New York to be heard.

The Senator from New York said, the party coming in were coming without principles, and they would be at liberty to adopt any measure they pleased. But did not the gentleman know that the party coming in were opposed to the Sub-Treasury? Did he not know that they were in favor of a sound and safe regulation of the currency, as far as it can be done consistently with the Constitution of the United States? Did he not know that they were for economy, and against the extravagance of the downfallen Administration? Did he not know they were for retrenchment, and that they were opposed to the extent and alarming magnitude, and fearful usurpation and abuse of Executive power? And therefore, the gentleman could not reprove them for a want of principle. After some other remarks, he said he found he was precipitated into the discussion beyond what he had intended; but in reference to the observations of the Senator from New York, he said he saw no necessity for much delay.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had supposed that the party about to come into power would have been content with their decisive victory, and that the business of the session would be allowed to go on quietly, without calling up any of the exciting topics that entered into the late canvass, or anticipating the measures belonging properly to the coming administration. The country has just passed through one of the most agitating canvasses it ever has, and it is time it should have repose; and he, for one, had determined, if it should not, it would not be his fault. Without adverting to the past, he had made up his mind to wait and form no opinion till General Harrison had assumed his high and responsible office, and developed the principles and policy on which he intended to administer the Government, in an official and responsible form. If he should, in good faith, by practice as well as profession, adopt the course which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has assured us he would; if his administration shall be one of retrenchment and economy, deep and thorough, for they are both much needed; if it shall be opposed to a national debt, funded or unfunded; if against the improper extension of Executive power, and shall be opposed to the use of its patronage as the means of rewarding mere partisan service; and if, finally, as intimated in the canvass by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] it should be conducted on the good old but much derided doctrines of Jefferson, it should not only have his approbation, but his cordial and cheerful support, notwithstanding his objections to the means by which his election was secured. But he would rather have these declarations officially from General Harrison himself, than from the honorable Senator, however high his authority might be considered. I (said Mr. C.) never have played, and never intend to play, the game of in and out in politics. It is unsuited to the nature of our Government, and unbecoming those invested with the high and sacred trust of administering it. His course was immovably made up. He would give the coming Administration his support in all measures which his judgment approved, and opposition to all which it disapproved; and, if he was found in systematic opposition, it would be because of systematic departure from the principles and policy which he believed to be essential to the prosperity and liberty of the Union.

With these views, he could not, with the Senator from New York, regard with pleasure the introduction of this resolution. On the contrary, he regarded it with regret, because it was calculated to keep up the excitement of the late canvass, and prevent the repose which naturally follows the deep agitation through which the country has just passed, and which is necessary to that calm review, without which it is impossible to correct past errors, and turn them to profitable account in future. Let the people have an interval of eight or nine months, from the end of this session to the commencement of the next, to think over calmly and deliberately the past, and the course that ought to be taken hereafter, and much profit will result to the country. Viewed in this light, he not only regretted the introduction of the resolution, but the ground on which the Senator puts the repeal of the measure contemplated. He assumes the ground that the people had decided against the Sub-Treasury in the late election. He (Mr. CALHOUN) doubted the fact. The election decided nothing but that General Harrison should be elected President for the next term; and he entered his solemn protest against the attempt to make any other inference the basis of our official action; and in doing so, he but took the ground taken by the Senator and those with whom he acted, when it was attempted to construe in a similar manner a former election to have decided against the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank, and in favor of certain measures to which he was opposed. He (Mr. CALHOUN) regarded every attempt at such inference to be dangerous and unconstitutional. No one had a higher regard for the voice of the people than he had; but he could only recognise it in his official acts, when pronounced through its proper organ, and on the subject, and to the extent only, which the Constitution made it binding. Thus thinking, he bowed in obedience to their voice, uttered in the late election; that General Harrison should be the next President, but to that extent only could he here, in his place as Senator, recognise it.

It is not only against the genius of our system to extend it farther, but idle to attempt to extend it to the measure the Senator has. Who is there that does not know that in the late canvass the great issue—who should be President—depended on a thousand others, direct and indirect, of which the Sub-Treasury was but one? Who does not remember that the imputed extravagance of the Administration, the report of one of the Secretaries on the militia question, Hooe's case, and innumerable other objections, were made to the present incumbent, as well as countless numbers urged in favor of his opponents, in addition to his objection to the Sub-Treasury? They must all have been supposed to influence the result, or surely they would not have been so zealously and incessantly urged by those who advocated the claims of the successful candidate. How, then, can gentlemen now turn round, and tell us that there was but a single question at issue, and that question the Sub-Treasury?

But he, Mr. C. desired to speak with perfect candor. Though he by no means considered it certain, yet there was reason to fear that a majority of the community was opposed to that highly important measure. If such should turn out to be the fact, he would regret it profoundly; but are gentlemen certain that there is a majority in favor of any alternative measure that can be presented, and that there is not a majority in its favor, against any such alternative? That is the point. Let me tell gentlemen, when they come to the real question—not only whether the Sub-Treasury shall be repealed, but what shall be substituted, they will not find so easy a victory as they expect. That is the question which you must meet, and it will be in vain to attempt to elude it. As to one of the only two possible alternatives—he referred to the repudiated and condemned pet bank system—which the gentleman had so justly denounced so far back as 1834, on the question of the removal of the deposits, as the most fallacious, rickety, and corrupt system which could be adopted, which they prophesied, and truly prophesied, would explode and blow up its authors, he took it for granted that there was no danger of that being imposed on the country by the coming administration. He trusted that would not be the result of all the late agitation, and the decided victory they had achieved.

As to the other alternative—a National Bank—he would not go into that now. It will be time enough, after General Harrison comes in, and recommends it to our adoption, if, with his constitutional objections, he ever should. But come when that time might, if it ever should, he should stand up and resist it every faculty, and all the energy with which nature had bestowed on him; for, as he lived, he believed the day on which a National Bank shall be established, with a capital of fifty or a hundred millions, and twenty years' duration, and with power and privileges sufficient to control the currency and business of the country, would be the end of our liberty, and would as effectually create a sovereign power, as if General Harrison were elected President for life, with the right of succession in his descendants, and even more so.

To either of these, the much abused Sub-Treasury will be found to be the only alternative. Condemned and vilified as it was, the country, if it desired to preserve its free institutions, must come to it; nor was it less for the advantage of the banks themselves, than the country, that it should. Yes, for the banks; he knew what he said; he weighed every word. He regarded those the greatest enemies, in reality, to the banks, however kind their intention, who would force them again into a union with the Government, against the deep conviction of the injustice, impolicy and unconstitutionality of such union, of a powerful and determined party, not much inferior in numbers than their opponents, if tested even by the late election; for, however strong the vote of the electoral college, the popular vote in favor of General Harrison did not much exceed one hundred thousand out of upwards of two millions of votes. If, against the fixed opinion of this powerful and resolute party, the coming Administration should force a reunion between bank and Government, they would, at the same time, force them into the political arena of party conflict, which could not fail to overthrow the whole system in its convulsive movements. He warned the banks, and those interested in them, against the fatal tendency of their indiscreet friends, who would, under such circumstances, force the reunion. He was no enemy to the existing banks, while he had no confidence in the system as it existed in this country and Great Britain. He believed that banks of issue and circulation were founded on a mistake, and must run down, by their own inherent defects, against every effort to stay their descent, and had long thought so; but he made no war on them, and never had. They were running down of themselves, according to his impression, too fast for the good of the country, and his policy was to retard, and not accelerate their descent. He acted on the same principle in 1834, when the deposits were removed; and in obedience to it, urged a course, which, if it had been adopted, would have saved the country and banks from the disasters which have since followed. On the same principle he acted at the extra session in 1837, and had ever since, in advocating the separation of the Government from the banks, as the only means of extricating them from politics, and leaving them quietly to be reformed or run out, under the action of an enlightened and calm public opinion. He was, and ever had been, averse to all sudden and forced measures in reference to the currency, even as applied to our system, as bad as he believed it to be.

In addition to the supposed condemnation of the Sub-Treasury by the people at the late election, the Senator urged another reason for its repeal, that it would make no practical change. He says that the practice under the existing law is, in reality, the same as it was before its passage, and would be after the repeal. If so, why, then, this haste to repeal it? Why agitate the country, so anxiously seeking repose, on a subject acknowledged by him to be wholly immaterial? Why not allow the measure to go on quietly until he and his party come into power, and then they could act deliberately on the subject, and not only repeal a measure they consider so obnoxious, but also present their substitute, so as to afford the community a fair opportunity of deciding between them? But be the practice under it what it may, the difference between the two states of things, that which now exists and that which would if the measure proposed by this resolution should be adopted, is far, very far, from being so immaterial as the Senator seems to suppose. The Sub-Treasury, as established by law, be it wise or not, is, at all events, legal and constitutional. No one can deny that; but should the Senator's resolution succeed, and the act be repealed, he would restore the state of things which he, and those with whom he has acted, have contended, for these three years, to be illegal and unconstitutional, and which placed the control over the public money wholly under the discretion of the Executive! Is that nothing?

As to the practice, if it be such as the Senator supposes, he (Mr. CALHOUN) held it directly contrary to law, and that the officer who had dared to practise it, deserved punishment and expulsion from office. If the Senator desired to pursue the subject, and would move a resolution to ascertain the facts, it should have his support. He would be the last to protect any officer, high or low, in the violation of law.

He had said more than he intended when he rose, but would not take his seat without again entreating the gentlemen on the other side not to force on a controversy at this time. The people of the United States had elected General Harrison, whether by proper or improper means, was not a question for him. He acquiesced in the decision, and wished to see the excitement, which accompanied the contest, subside. He was prepared to give his administration a fair trial, as he would any other constitutionally elected by the people. He should watch it with a vigilant eye, but with no disposition to oppose, unless his measures should force him into opposition, in defence of what he believed to be the welfare and liberty of the country.

Mr. ANDERSON said that, occupying the position which he did, after what had fallen from the honorable Senator from Kentucky, he felt it to be his duty to express his entire dissent from the views which had been urged upon the Senate in support of the proposition now under consideration. He said that he regretted exceedingly that the Senator had deemed it proper to bring up anew the exciting questions which had so recently agitated the country. In this he concurred with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, and believed that the public mind needed repose, at least for a short period; and he could not but express his astonishment that any attempt should now be made which would necessarily pass in review the events of the last canvass. Sir, said he, I do not express this regret because of the position which I may be supposed to hold in relation to that question, and coming, as I do, from a State which has cast its suffrage for General Harrison. A more suitable time will arrive, when this whole subject would properly come under the administrative action of the President elect; but now it must bring up a discussion of events utterly unprofitable to the public welfare, and about which a wide difference of opinion has surely obtained, if I understand rightly the true ground upon which the gentleman has based his proposition to repeal the Independent Treasury act. The gentleman said that the recent election of General Harrison was an implied instruction to Senators coming from the nineteen States which had supported him, to repeal that measure. Sir, I deny that this inference is just; and a strong objection to the resolution proposed by the honorable gentleman is, that it is not supported by such an issue in the late canvass as to make it conclusive. I deny that the Independent Treasury was the inducing cause to the success of General Harrison. It was not the exclusive issue. Following, sir, the example set by older Senators of both parties, I mingled among the people in this contest, and knew that other questions had a much more powerful effect—questions which were made to go home to their hopes and their fears—and that they did not consider this as the great issue upon which they were to decide. The extraordinary pressure of the times, some peculiar circumstances, and the military services of General Harrison, advancing in the lead of the mass of questions, had a most powerful agency in producing the result! Who, sir, can forget that his military pretensions were urged, with great ardor and eloquence upon this floor by the gentleman from South Carolina, who usually sits opposite to me—and by the gentleman from Kentucky, who sits to my right on the other side of the house. And can we fail to advert to the very fountain from which sprang all their success—their convention at Harrisburg? There they solemnly resolved that they would make no formal declaration of their opinions—no, sir, none. The thing was to be left to the individual skill and judgment of their partisans; and now, after the close of the contest, the first step to be taken is an absolute demand, upon this floor, that Congress shall declare, in effect, that such was the issue made and decided before the people. The very avowal of the Senator from Kentucky, when pressed by the Senator from New York upon the subject of the United States Bank, as the antagonist measure to the Independent Treasury, that “sufficient for the day is the evil thereof,” is mysterious, but equivalent to the declaration that the Independent Treasury was the great exclusive issue before the people. I utterly deny this inference. There were numerous issues, and a combination of causes, which it is unnecessary to repeat.

I trust that I would be among the last men deliberately to attempt, in a representative capacity, to disobey the instructions of my constituents. But, sir, no instructions, such as insisted upon, have been made; and the honorable gentleman will find, when he submits the true issue of a United States Bank as the antagonist of the Independent Treasury, the decision of the people will in all probability be against the former. Then, and not till then, shall we have the true issue, and the true result.

Mr. HUBBARD rose and said: Mr. President—I cannot deny, when I read the resolution in the morning's paper, which had been offered on yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky, that I was somewhat surprised. I little anticipated any such movement during this short session of Congress. I had supposed that the repeal of the Independent Treasury act would be attempted under the next Administration, but I had not even imagined that it would then be urged without presenting some substitute; and I must confess that I did not look for such a proposition from any quarter during the continuance of the present Administration. It is, however, before us; and it presents a distinct question. The resolution proposes to instruct the Committee on Finance to report a bill providing for the immediate repeal of the Sub-Treasury act; it is presented to the same Senate; it proposes to bring the subject before the very Congress which, but a few months past, enacted this very measure. Sir, I could not have believed that any member of this body would urge upon the Senate the repeal of this measure which had been adopted after so much debate, after so much reflection, and after so much consideration. But, I again say, that the proposition has been presented; let us now meet it manfully, and with a determination to review the whole ground. I cannot say, with the Senator from South Carolina, that I regret that this proposition has been brought forward. I can say that I did not anticipate it. I can assure the Senator from Kentucky, before us as it is, it cannot silently be disposed of. It must, and I trust it will, be debated, and fully debated. Let the whole ground which has heretofore been occupied in argument, be re-examined; and let it be made to appear, if it can be, that our positions are untenable, and that our arguments are fallacious, and that the measure itself ought to be abandoned. If all that can be shown, then, for one, I shall be prepared to vote for its repeal; but until that can be done, I will sustain the measure, essentially connected, as I believe it to be, with the best interests of the country, with what little ability I possess. What are the reasons, Mr. President, which have induced the honorable Senator from Kentucky to offer his resolution? He says that the result of the late election is an expression of the deliberate judgment of the American people in relation to this measure. That they have spoken, in language too plain to be misunderstood, their utter condemnation of this Sub-Treasury system. That they have demanded at our hands its immediate repeal. Sir, I utterly deny the fact, and I stand here saying that no man has the right to make any such deductions from the result of the recent Presidential election. The declaration is unwarranted, in my judgment, from the facts known to have existed during that canvass. What right has the Senator to say that any such issue was made up before the American people? Where is the evidence of it? Who ever heard from the party newspapers of the day, that the new dynasty intended a repeal of the Sub-Treasury, and that an appeal was ever made to the people, urging upon them the propriety of changing the present Administration, so as effectually to put down “this bill of abominations,” as they were pleased to call it. Others may have seen such avowals, but if they existed, they wholly escaped my observation. No declaration was made by the great Convention at Harrisburg against this Sub-Treasury policy, which had been in operation for years before. No such manifesto has been published since by any convention opposed to the present Administration. This was not the issue made up before the American people.

It may have been intended—it was certainly not avowed—and until this resolution was offered, who has ever heard that it was the purpose of the Opposition to bring about a repeal of the Sub-Treasury, without, at the same time, presenting some other measure in its stead?

Mr. President, I well recollect that soon after the Convention at Harrisburg, and just before the spring elections in Virginia, a document was sent forth under the authority of an executive committee. And was the Administration assailed in that document for its Independent Treasury operations? No, sir; the Administration was attacked for its alleged wastefulness, its profligacy and corruption, in relation to the public expenditures. It was attacked for attempting to palm upon the country a standing army of two hundred thousand militia. It was the expenses of the Administration, and Mr. Poinsett's militia report, which constituted the grounds of attack in the document to which I have referred; and they constituted the great burden of the Opposition song in my country, from the close of the late session of Congress, until the day of election. Had the direct proposition been submitted to the American people, “Will you continue the Independent Treasury system as it is, or will you go back to the State bank deposit system as it was in 1836?” what think you, sir, would have been their decision? For one, I entertain no doubt, if the people could have been left to the exercise of their sober judgment, that they would have returned a clear verdict in favor of this great measure of the present Administration. And just so would it have been had the question been a Bank of the United States or a continuance of the present system. But no such issue was made, and of consequence, no such decision has been given as has been alleged. No such inference can fairly be drawn from the result of the late election.

The Senator from Kentucky says, unless the repeal of this act now takes place, that, as soon as a Congress can be assembled after the 4th of March next, they will not fail to accomplish the work. Be it so. I rejoice at this distinct declaration of the Senator. I did not believe that it would even be attempted without going further. The declaration of hostility to this great measure has gone forth, and I rejoice at it; and time will show whether the Senator from Kentucky is right in his calculations as to the state of popular opinion—of public sentiment with reference to this measure. In my own State, I know full well that it is held in high commendation; and if it be true, as alleged, that the result of the late elections is to be regard-ad as a test of the popularity of this measure, the Senator himself will, and must admit, that the people of New Hampshire have expressed a most undoubted opinion in its favor, for the majority in that State, friendly to this Administration, is one hundred per cent. greater now than it was at the last contested election in 1838.

I cannot doubt, no member of this Senate, no citizen of this country, has a right to doubt, that the Independent Treasury act which passed at the last session of Congress, and which is now the law of the land, and in successful operation, is to be made the subject of attack by the next administration. This purpose is avowed distinctly by the Senator from Kentucky. And although we are without any official promulgation of this intent from him who has been elected to preside over this nation, yet it comes to us in no questionable shape. It is avowed by the very man whom the President-elect has recently declared (if I read the journals of the times correctly) is more worthy of the place than himself. It is, therefore, fair to infer that the Senator speaks like one having authority. I shall not be here; but able and efficient friends will be ready to take care of this great measure. Let all prepare for the contest. Then, and not till then, will this battle be fought with any prospect of success. The present movement cannot succeed, in my judgment.

The Senator from Kentucky says that there is no practical difference in the management of our fiscal concerns under the sub-Treasury system, and under that system which existed anterior to the coming in of this Administration. It may be so; but, if the fact be as stated, those charged with the execution of the law are greatly in fault, and should be held answerable for any departure from the line of their official duty. But, sir, I greatly mistake the sequel of the times—I greatly misjudge the indications of popular feeling, if there is not an increasing sentiment favorable to this Sub-Treasury policy. And if the new Administration design nothing more than the repeal of this measure, their anticipated security in the confidence and support of the community will fail them. The Senator has appealed to me for information as to the manner of executing this Treasury scheme. Mr. President, I may not live quite as remote from one of these Receivers General as the Senator himself, and, unlike him, I have no wish to live more remote. One thing I believe as much as I believe in my existence—that he who is charged with the execution of this act at Boston does not disregard its provisions in practice. I know him well; and, knowing him as I do, I should be slow to believe that the Receiver General at that point fails to carry into full effect the letter of the Independent Treasury act. If he does, sir, I can assure the Senator from Kentucky the fact is unknown to me. The known fidelity of that officer is a sure guarantee that his whole duty will be performed.

The Senator from Kentucky has seen fit to allude to a recent election in my own State—why, or wherefore, I cannot tell. Its connection with the question before us I do not readily discover. What it has to do with the adoption of his resolution I am unable to see. But, sir, if the Senator has adverted to that occurrence—to the result of that election—in the belief that it has led to any interruption of the friendly relations which have hitherto existed between the distinguished individual who now presides over the fiscal department of our Government and myself, he is entirely mistaken. He has spoken of my readiness on all occasions to defend that officer and his measures—and he has been pleased to add that I have defended him “with great ability and with great eloquence.” Sir, it has been my fortune, since I have been a member of this Senate, to hear attacks frequently made upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the Senator and his friends. Against those attacks I have defended him, and successfully defended him; but my success was to be attributed to the merit of the defence, and not to any particular ability of his defender. It is true that, for a long time, there has been kept up an unreserved intimacy between that officer and myself; and a more faithful, intelligent, and industrious officer, has not been connected with the Government during its continuance. The administration of the department over which he has so long and so ably presided in the worst of times; the difficulties and discouragement which he has experienced in the performance of his official duties, and which he has so triumphantly overcome; the present state and condition of that Department, show to the world that the attacks which have been so gratuitously made upon that officer, are without foundation. It is true, sir, that an election has recently been made by the Legislature of our native State, and that election has resulted in elevating to the office of United States Senator the individual to whom I have referred. The people of my State had given a triumphant vote in favor of Mr. Van Buren's administration. That administration had been defeated by the decision of the American people. No man had been more devoted to, or identified with, the Administration, than the individual now at the head of the Treasury Department. No man in the country is better prepared to defend the measures and to carry out the policy of that Administration than the Secretary himself. And from the avowal which has been made on this floor this day, it must be matter of gratulation and pride to the people of my own State and of the country, that he will be here ready to meet the Senator from Kentucky, face to face, in defending his favorite measure against the assaults of its enemies. Sir, I have no cause to complain, neither of the successful candidate nor of my own people. I know full well the considerations which induced the result—considerations honorable to my own State and satisfactory to myself. And if I should never discover any other evidence of the ingratitude of the Secretary, or of the defection of my own people, I should not be disturbed by any private griefs. The Senator will find it somewhat difficult to satisfy my mind that I have been defeated by my friends, and that the result of that election has tended, in the slightest degree, to lessen me in the estimation of the people of my native State.

Mr. ALLEN then moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word “resolved,” and insert the following:

“That the financial policy established at the origin of this Government, by the first acts of its legislation, and especially by the 30th section of the ‘Act to regulate the collection of duties, &c.’ approved by President Washington, July 31st, 1789, and by the 4th section of the ‘Act to establish the Treasury Department, &c.’ approved by President Washington, September 21, 1789, was in strict conformity to the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

“Resolved, That, by a long series of subsequent acts tending to the great detriment of the public welfare, that policy had been departed from, and was, by the ‘Act to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue,’ approved by President Van Buren, July 4, 1840, fully restored, and ought to be adhered to; and therefore “Resolved, That the Government ought to collect no more taxes from the people, either directly or indirectly, than are absolutely necessary to an economical administration of its affairs.

“Resolved, That the taxes paid by the people ought not to be lent out by the Government to individuals or to corporations.

“Resolved, That the taxes so paid by the people ought not to be placed by the Government in the custody of agents who are not made by the Constitution and the laws responsible to the people.

“Resolved, That in the transaction of its own affairs, the Government ought to receive and to tender in payment as money, nothing but that which is made a legal tender by the Constitution.”

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, the resolution was laid on the table, and the substitute was ordered to be printed.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 15, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. JONES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, on leave introduced a bill making an appropriation in part for the support of Government for the year 1841; which was read twice and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BAIGES in the Chair, and took up the above bill.

Mr. CUSHING said he had occasion, a few days ago, to accompany a friend—a messenger from one of the electoral colleges—to the Treasury Department, who went there to settle his accounts, as provided for under a regulation of Congress. His friend was informed by the First Auditor that no payment could be made until an appropriation should be made by Congress. Mr. C. would inquire whether now would not be the time to make an amendment to the bill for this object.

Mr. J. W. JONES said he had had no interview with the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject. He could not see why any portion of the amount could be appropriated to that object; the subjects mentioned in the bill being wholly distinct.

Mr. CUSHING then moved to amend the bill by adding thereto an additional section providing for the payment of the messengers who may convey to the seat of Government the electoral votes given in the several States for President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. J. W. JONES suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it would not be proper to have the amount specified in the detailed statements furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, at $12,000, in place of $20,000, to pay the expenses of bringing to the seat of Government the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. CUSHING acquiesced in the suggestion.

The question then being on the amendment to the bill, it was agreed to, without a count.

Mr. JONES, in reply to an objection made by Mr. STANLY to the item of $100,000 for stationery, remarked that the committee, in filling up the blank with the sum in question, had not inserted the whole amount estimated by the Clerk of the House, which was $150,000. They therefore imagined there would be no difficulty, at this period of the session, in obtaining an appropriation of $100,000 for that object, being but one-half the amount appropriated at the last session of Congress, and more especially as the contingent fund of the House was now entirely exhausted.

On motion of Mr. J. the committee then rose, and reported the bill, as amended, to the House.

The amendment was then concurred in, and the bill, as amended, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BRIGGS called the attention of the House to an error he had discovered in document No. 3, being the annual estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury of the Treasury. He was desirous that the error should be corrected before the copies ordered by the House should be printed.

After some debate, of a desultory character, as to whether the error originated in the Treasury Department or with the printer, the Clerk was directed to have the proper correction made.

Mr. PETRIKIN, at his request, was excused from acting as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HAND, in pursuance of notice given on Thursday last, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed on that subject; which was read twice.

The question being then put, it was decided in the affirmative, and the bill so referred.

The question then being taken on the motion to print, it was agreed to.

FINANCES OF THE COUNTRY.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WRIGHT on Monday last, to refer so much of the President's message as relates to the finances of the country to the Committee on Finance, which had been postponed on the motion of Mr. WEBSTER, coming up for consideration,

Mr. WEBSTER, pursuant to his intimation on Monday, when the reference of so much of the President's message as relates to the finances of the country to the Finance Committee was postponed until Wednesday, rose to state his views on that subject. He said, though he was induced to make some remarks on the President's message, especially at this early period of the session, he had no wish to bring on a prolonged and angry or exciting discussion on topics which the message contained; but, as the message of the President, which had been laid before them, contained an elaborate and plausible defence of the whole course of the Administration on the subject of the finances and the currency of the country—as it dealt with the topics of banks and banking excesses, of trade and commerce and speculation, with State debts, and the dangers to be apprehended from that source, and the Sub-Treasury, or the Independent Treasury, as it was sometimes called, he wished to make a few observations. But he proposed, on the present occasion, to deal with some of these topics. So far as they may be supposed to affect the merits and character of the Administration, they had, as he understood it, been passed upon by the country, and he had now no disposition to reargue them, or any of them; nor did he wish to enter into an inquiry as to what might be supposed to be approved or disapproved by the result of the election which they had so recently witnessed, for his purpose, especially on the present occasion; it was enough for him that it was the disposition of the country to change the Administration. All he proposed to do was to make some remarks on that part of the message respecting the finances of the country, and to speak of the present state of things in regard to that important branch of the public service with no recurrence to the past, with no speculation for the future; yet he supposed a proper forecast, a proper disposition to provide for what is before us, in all questions in relation to the revenue and finances of the country, connected itself with all inquiries and observations of that sort. Now, with this view, he wished to make a few remarks upon the message, and it seemed necessary to premise them with a few preliminary observations; but they should be very short.

Now it appeared to him that an unfounded impression, an erroneous sentiment, both as to matters of opinion and of fact, might be communicated to the people by the message before them. In this point of view he wished to make a remark on what it contained, or on part of what it contained. On the eighth page of the message, which represents that the great distinctive principles or differences characterizing public men in this country, is that some have had a constant objection, from the foundation of our Government, to make and maintain a public debt, and that others had had a contrary object. Now this was an unfounded imputation on those who in past time had administered the Government of this country. He says:

"I have deemed this brief summary of our fiscal affairs necessary to the due performance of a duty specially enjoined upon me by the Constitution. It will serve, also, to illustrate more fully the principles by which I have been guided in reference to two contested points in our public policy, which were earliest in their development, and have been more important in their consequences, than any that have arisen under our complicated and difficult, yet admirable, system of Government: I allude to a national debt, and a national bank. It was in these that the political contests by which the country has been agitated ever since the adoption of the Constitution, in a great measure, originated; and there is too much reason to apprehend that the conflicting interests and opposing principles thus marshalled, will continue, as heretofore, to produce similar, if not aggravated, consequences."

About a National Bank he (Mr. W.) would say nothing at present, but there they were officially told that what had been, and what was likely to be, the great contested question in this country, was whether there shall or shall not be a national debt. Now he submitted to the good sense and candor of that body, whether any party ever did exist; or does now exist, to whom it could be fairly imputed as an object per se, as a thing desirable, to create a national debt. Since the Declaration of our Independence, in all time past, what was our history? The first national debt was contracted in Holland during the war, by John Adams. Did any man doubt the propriety of that, in the then circumstances of the country? Was there any Senator that doubted the propriety of obtaining that loan? Then, again, there was the debt contracted for the pay due to the Revolutionary army after our Government was established, by the Continental Congress: there were also the debts contracted during the progress of the war, by the States, for carrying on the war; and provision was made to pay these debts, because they were debts contracted in the progress of the Revolution. Could any man oppose that, or say there was any thing unreasonable or improvident in obtaining loans to enable the Government to carry on the late war with Great Britain? Now contrast one party with another in the history of our Government, and he could not but think it singularly unfortunate that so much of what looks like imputation should be contained in this message which comes from the head of an Administration, which Administration, so far as he knew, was the first that ever existed under this Government, that had begun a national debt in a time of profound peace.

But to proceed to the actual state of the finances of the country. The message, though it does not call the obligations of the country a permanent debt, while speaking in earnest terms against the commencement of a public debt, does admit outstanding Treasury notes, bearing interest, to the amount of four and a half millions of dollars; and he thought, connected with this, there were other important and leading truths, very useful to be considered by those who would judge wisely, and who would look to the future providently in regard to the finances of the country. And the first truth, in point of importance, he thought, was that, for some years past, the expenditures of the Government had greatly exceeded the income of the Government. He was not then about to argue the question whether the expenditures of the Government had been extravagant or not; whether they had been reasonable or unreasonable. He looked at the subject in a financial point of view, and he there stated that their experience of the result of the administration of the Government and the action of Congress for the last four years, showed that the expenditure of the Government exceeded, at the rate of at least seven millions of dollars a year, the income of the Government; and this might be easily demonstrated. They knew that from the commencement of January, 1837, there was in the Treasury, reserved by the deposit act, six millions of dollars. The intention was to reserve five millions, but the Secretary of the Treasury made his computation somewhat in advance—he, therefore, did not ascertain exactly what would be in, and it turned out that there was something about six millions of dollars in the Treasury about the 1st of January, 1837. Then events occurred which led Congress, in September of 1837, to pass a law to repeal or qualify the law of June, called the deposit act, to retain or bring back to the Treasury the fourth instalment of the deposits to the States, amounting to nine millions of dollars. They also found, by a communication now before them, that the amount of stock belonging to the United States in the Bank of the United States, and for which bonds were given to the Treasury by the President of the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, and which bonds have been since paid, was eight millions of dollars, which from that source had been received into the Treasury. Now these were pre-existing funds, some of which had accrued to Government since January, 1837; and they might add the sums he had already mentioned, as being now outstanding on Treasury notes bearing interest, and thus make an aggregate of twenty-seven and a half millions of dollars expended in the course of these three and a half or four years, excepting, of course, what may remain in the Treasury at the end of that term. That, then, was nearly at the rate of eight millions of dollars per annum expended beyond the income; and what a condition of things was that. Suppose it should go on by the succeeding Administration, or suppose it should have continued to go on by the present, if it had remained in power; did not every body see a great and vast debt immediately before them? But is this all—is this all? He was inclined to think that in one respect it was not all; he was inclined to think that the Treasury had not duly distinguished, in one important branch of its administration, what may be called Treasury funds, or United States funds proper, and trust fund set apart by treaties by precise treaty stipulations, for the benefit of certain Indian tribes. He thought the Treasury had taken to its own account, as an income of Government, what did properly belong to another account; what did properly belong to a trust fund, which Government had stipulated by treaties to invest in stock, sometimes under its own guarantee, for the benefit of Indian tribes. This made it necessary to look a little into the trust fund provided for the Indians by certain treaties, for at least there were several of them. He should recur to one or two of the most important, and simply state how matters stand by the evidence contained in documents communicated to Congress. Now, by recurring to official reports from the Departments to Congress, they found there was invested in State stocks, for various tribes, from the year 1833 to the year 1837, by the War Department, the sum of $1,820,763 16. Now he did not complain of this investment. He observed that there a premium paid on these stocks of $47,441 76; but he observed that Indiana, Kentucky, and New York stocks were purchased at a discount of half per cent. Alabama and Arkansas stocks were purchased at par; Missouri stock was purchased at 3 44-100 premium; Maryland stock at from 3 to 15½ premium; and Michigan stock at 8 per cent. premium. Now, he supposed it was very probable that the difference in these rates might arise from the difference in the rate of interest, for some of them were at 5 per cent. and some at six. He saw that New York were at five, and he believed Maryland were at six.

They found, also, that there was invested in State stocks up to April 11th, 1838, for the Chickasaws, by the Treasury Department, the sum of $1,994,141 03. The premium paid for these stocks was $34,537 51. The United States received from this tribe from the sales of their lands, to 1st January, 1838, $2,498,000 06; stock and premium $2,028,678 54; leaving uninvested $369,321 52, which, Mr. Woodbury says, "has become mixed up in the general fund" of the United States. It may be, for he thought he had somewhere heard that $94,000 more had been invested. He believed the treaties with the Indians stipulated that the proceeds of their lands, of whatsoever amount, should be invested in permanent stock, bearing interest of not less than 5 per cent. and to be perpetually held for the use of the Indians. Now it appeared that instead of keeping a separate account of this trust fund, the proceeds of these sales were all passed in the general receipts and accounts of the Treasury; and that expended in the purchase of stock, for the purpose of this investment, was charged on the other side of the account. This is a matter of account, and of book-keeping, which may or may not be thought correct; he should have supposed that it would have been more just and proper to have kept a separate account of that trust fund, as every man who is a trustee, if he means to administer his trust accurately and properly, would do; but he supposed that was not a matter of paramount importance—it was a matter of accounts, and of book-keeping; but if these things be, as he gathered from these documents, there was this sum of between $300,000 and 400,000 not invested, which remained under the stipulations to be invested. And then as to the rate at which these sums or stocks were purchased by the Treasury Department. Alabama bonds purchased the 31st of March, 1836, were purchased at a premium of four and a half per cent.; other Alabama bonds purchased immediately afterwards, in the language of the Secretary's report, purchased at a premium of four per cent.; others the 7th of May, 1836, at three and a half per cent. premium; others purchased on the 29th of March, 1837, at one per cent. discount; Tennessee bonds were purchased at par; Ohio bonds at above eleven per cent. advance; part of the Maryland bonds at three per cent. discount, and part at above fourteen per cent. advance. He did not see the time stated at which this last purchase of Maryland bonds was made. This was made by the Treasury Department, but then as to the others—

Mr. WRIGHT inquired what documents the honorable Senator alluded to.

Mr. WEBSTER replied, Document 2, of 1839, and Document 4, of 1836. He then resumed: It would seem, then, that by the several treaties, the dates of which he found in the documents, and all he believed in 1837 and 1838, they had stipulated to invest the money promised to be paid for land, in stocks—permanent stocks bearing interest, and some of them under their own guarantee. Here, then, the United States stood indebted to these Indian tribes the whole amount which they promised to give for the land of the Indians, which they had ceded to the United States and passed over under our land law, and a large portion of which he supposed had been disposed of—at any rate they had obtained the land and promised these tribes the sums contracted with them, and which they had promised to invest in permanent stock, but which they had not done; and instead of making appropriations at any time heretofore to buy this stock, the Treasury Department had contented itself with making such an appropriation as would defray the annual accruing interest that the United States was debtor to the tribes. Now the value for $2,580,100 had actually been furnished, and this was a debt to all intents and purposes and was to be added to whatever else of debt existed against the Government. He did not mean to say it was a debt that was to be paid to-morrow or the next day, but it was a debt which the Government was bound to provide for in some reasonable time: it was a debt contracted in 1837 and '38, and Government was at this moment under the obligation to raise money and buy the stock and hold it for the use of the Indians. Large quantities of the lands of eight tribes have been sold, and the money has been carried to the Treasury, and audited as national income to the United States, instead of being invested for the use of the tribes, leaving this heavy charge still to be borne by the Treasury. The balance of the proceeds of the sales of the lands of the Winnebagoes alone, amounts, as he understood the accounts, to $1,100,000. No part of this has been invested; the Treasury credits it as so much money received on general account, and leaves the means of raising the money to fulfil the treaty by buying the stocks, to the next Administration. Now, if this be so, there is another sum of $300,000, also, as he believed, due to the Scow of the Mississippi, under the treaty of September, 1837, which has not been invested, according to the stipulation of the treaty. And, if this too be so, the result of all this is, that, to the outstanding debt on account of Treasury notes in the first place, must be added this Indian debt, a proper provision for which ought, in all fairness, and in good faith, to be made in a reasonable time. And that there were other debts outstanding which must soon be provided for, he supposed nobody would doubt. There was the debt on account of public works and other contracts; there were unpaid expenses growing out of the operations of the army in Florida, and Indian depredations on the Southern and Southwestern frontier, and he supposed that nobody doubted that these were to be provided for; and also other great amounts of unliquidated debts and claims, on account of which they might expect large demands. He understood, then, that there was a debt existing over this country in various shapes, some for borrowed money, some of which had grown out of stipulations by treaty, and some unliquidated demands growing out of a great variety of sources, amounting to a great amount, all of which was to be provided for. Now he agreed with all that was said in the message, of the great impolicy in a time of peace of commencing a public debt; but it did seem to him extraordinary and inappropriate to admonish others in that strain against commencing a public debt with these facts presented to their view, because he supposed nobody would act on that as a point of principle, but of expediency; and there was no difference as to the form of the existing debt, whether it assumed the shape of stock for a term of a few years, or Treasury notes renewable or expected to be renewed from time to time as they became due; or if there was a difference on the point of expediency, then he differed much from those who acted on the present system, as to which was the most expedient; for the Treasury note system was not the cheapest system to borrow money. Now this existence of a debt was as old as the Administration itself; this Treasury note debt began when the Administration began. From the first session, called in September, and from the date of the first bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, in September, 1837, down to the present time, there has been no moment when the Government has not been in debt for borrowed money; and if he understood either the message or the report of the Secretary to the Treasury, it is not now expected that this debt can be paid, if then, earlier than March, 1842; because, if he understood the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury—whatever soft words be used—the sum and substance of it was, there must be a new issue of Treasury notes, to enable the Government to be free from embarrassment this time next year. Now he must confess that he thought the scope and tendency of the remarks in the message, in this particular, go to produce an erroneous impression in the public mind. Here were a series of strong observations run out throughout many pages against a public debt—against the commencement of a public debt; and reasons were given to show that when a national debt was once commenced, its inevitable tendency was to increase in magnitude. All this might be very true of the debt already begun and existing now, and under such circumstances of the country as may induce the fear that it may soon be a large one. But what was to be the result of this impression? They knew there were large outstanding items to be charged—they knew there were these sums, which they would be called upon to pay under the Indian stipulations; and there were others which would not be brought together, and presented in the aggregate as a charge on the Government, for some months to come. Was it intended then to forestall public opinion, and out of what will appear, when collected and summed up hereafter, to be a large public debt, composed of charges for which the existing Government is liable, to make it stand as a public debt to the account of the Government posterior to the 4th of March, 1841? He hoped there was no such intention; he did not impute such intention; but he said the scope and tendency, the general drift of the message was that way. But so far as he was concerned, he should take special and good care to prevent such a result. He should recommend, undoubtedly, that a new set of books be opened—that there should be what merchants call a "reset"—that what had been contracted and stipulated, and what had been collected—what had been received and expended to March, 1841, should stand against each other; and after that period that the balance, if favorable, should be called the sum accumulated by the providence of the Administration, and should be passed to its credit; but if the result were otherwise, and there were a debt, then, in all fairness, the Administration should still stand on its merits, and the debt should be denominated the debt of 1841, whether it stood in Treasury notes, or in any other shape, making it the duty of Government to provide for it.

In one or two other respects he thought the message was calculated to produce quite an erroneous impression. It would be found stated on the fifth page, in as mitigating a phrase as can be,—or, perhaps, he should say mitigated,—that this outstanding debt of four and a half millions of dollars is not yet due. Why, they all knew that; but then again it is said that this four and a half millions, after all, does not amount to so much, by twenty-three millions, as the United States have in deposit with the States. Now he asked the Senate, and if he could he would ask the President himself, whether he meant to recommend Congress to withdraw that deposit from the States, or part of it, to meet this outstanding debt, and as a fund out of which he meant to recommend the discharge of any charge on the Treasury? He (Mr. WEBSTER) found no recommendation of such a course; why then the connection? The four and a half millions, says the President, is less, by twenty-three millions, than the sum which the United States have in deposit with the States. There is nothing in that remark, unless he meant to refer to that as a fund out of which the four and a half millions were to be paid. Why put them together unless he means the deposits as a fund out of which the four and a half millions are to be paid; and if he means to intimate that, does he recommend it? The Secretary of the Treasury, too, treats this sum in deposit with the States in the same way; he speaks of it as money in the Treasury. Look at his report, and at the tables in his report. Why, he makes out a statement which includes the 28,000,000 in deposit to the States. Now, what can be the use of that form in the Treasury accounts? When an officer of a Department of the Government makes out his accounts, and presents a statement of the condition of the Treasury, and the means of the Treasury, he (Mr. WEBSTER) supposed he would confine himself to a statement of the sums already in the Treasury, or likely to accrue to the Treasury under existing laws. But this sum of twenty-eight millions, which had passed to the States under the law of 1836, no more could go to the Treasury than any other sum in the hands of the States. He (the Secretary of the Treasury) knew it could not—he knew an act of Congress was as necessary to produce that fund as to produce direct taxes, or the receipts of the custom-house. This was not under the power of the Treasury to use it for its own purposes, than as directed by law. What was the purpose, then—for purpose he presumed there must be—in presenting this twenty-three millions as a fund of the Treasury, as though the Treasury Department could exercise power over it? For what purpose was this sum mentioned in a statement, made to ascertain what the Government owes, and the means of payment, or part payment? Was this referred to as a means of payment, unless it was meant to say that Congress may pass a law for its recall? Until that was done, it was well known that it was no more available to the Treasury than were new duties at the custom-house before a law was passed for their collection; and it could not be made to defray any charge on the Government, until Congress exercised this power. He did hope—he had desired for years to see, and he hoped he one day should see, a mode of stating these Treasury accounts, giving the plain facts and statements, and leaving much less to guesses about the future, and much less—he would not say attempts to conceal and mystify—but of forms and phrases, the result of which was to mystify.

Again: though the Secretary pretty clearly intimates that there must be a present or immediate resort to Treasury notes, the result of his deliberations is, that if Congress wish to avoid the necessity of either a resort to the custom-house or of new loans, he has a remedy in reserve; and that is to reduce the expenditures of the Government below the estimates—below his own estimates! Why this was pretty much like a case which happened last year, when they were told that the estimates had been reduced to the lowest possible scale, and yet that they had kept within that scale.

But there was another remark on the sixth page of the message, which he thought deserved a passing notice. The President says, to accomplish the great object of keeping the expenditures within the income, two things are indispensable: "First, that the action of the Federal Government be kept within the boundaries prescribed by its founders." Well, now he supposed that this duty of keeping the action of the Federal Government within the bounds of the Constitution, was an absolute duty; not of terms and circumstances, and conditions, but always peremptory—always mandatory. What was the inference to be drawn? If they wished to keep down the expenditures, and the Treasury was low—if they wished then to keep within the Constitution, what if it were full? Would they transcend the Constitution? There was no one limit to their duty in this respect, whether the Treasury were full or empty, they were not to be tempted to exceed the bounds if the Treasury were full—they were not to be deterred from coming up to it by an empty Treasury.

Again, there was another important omission, as it struck him, in the message, to which he wished to call attention. The President says that, in addition to a decrease in the revenue, "two and a half millions of duties have been relinquished by two biennial reductions under the act of 1833." Be it so; but did the President—did they not all know that there was before them, within a year, a much greater relinquishment—if that was the proper phrase—of duties, and, within a year and a half, a still greater, and last? Did they not see, therefore, from the existence of the debt already contracted, in some form or another, against the Government, and from these certain reductions of duties—if the law should remain unaltered, and nothing should be done about it—did they not see that a case was before the country which would require all the wisdom of Congress, and some effort, to enable it to discharge a good deal of its obligations? But he saw no recommendation of any increase of duties on articles of luxury, such as silks and wines, nor any proposition in any other way made to provide for these demands on the Treasury now before them, and some of them near at hand. Here, then, the result of the whole is, that the President's experience for the four years of his administration has shown him that the revenues of the Government are not adequate to its expenditures—his experience has shown him the necessity of expending seven millions a year beyond the income; that the country is running right into the jaws of debt, and that there is no prospect of increasing the revenue whatever, no means of reduction pointed out, and yet the message contains an earnest, an ardent, and a general admonition not to create a public debt. Now he (Mr. WEBSTER) knew not, of course, what was expected to be done to meet the contingencies which must arise, as the Secretary says, in the first quarter of the next year, but he supposed the suggestion would be followed, authorizing the emission of Treasury notes. He (Mr. WEBSTER) would much have preferred, himself, that other provision should have been made; especially, as he had often said to the Senate, that a tax should be laid on French silks and French wines; but, if no hint of this sort were done, the time was coming when provision must be made from another source. He hoped these liabilities would be provided for fairly and fully during this session of Congress; he, for one, should deprecate, as very inconvenient and expensive, the being driven to an extra session of Congress, and he hoped those having the power at this time would make such reasonable provision as that that necessity would be obviated.

Mr. WRIGHT said there was a single topic touched by the Senator from Massachusetts, and but one, on which he desired further information before he attempted the reply which his remarks called for. If it was perfectly agreeable to the Senator, therefore, he wished that the further consideration of the subject might be postponed until to-morrow. If, however, it was the pleasure of the Senate to take the vote to-day, he would proceed with his remarks.

Mr. WEBSTER and the Senate generally acquiesced in the postponement.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN,
The Senate adjourned.

The several States having now been called,

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS] calling for information in respect to our COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH CHINA.

The resolution having been again read, (see above,)

Mr. ADAMS, after some remarks showing the importance of ascertaining what are the true political and commercial relations between this Government and China, observed it was highly desirable in the present critical state of affairs with the latter country, that we should know whether our Consul had been recognised by it or not. He wished to know the exact footing on which we stand. Mr. A. in advertent to some documents presented at the last session, said he believed it appeared from one of them, that when our Consul was about to present a memorial from American citizens at Canton, he was directed by the authorities to place the name of the Emperor of China two inches higher than the name of the President of the United States. This he thought was the true ground of war now raging between Great Britain and China—this placing the name "two inches higher"—this boasted superiority above every nation on earth.

But, continued Mr. A. I hope to see the day when this boasted claim to superiority shall cease, and that at least the name of the President of the United States shall be written on a parallel line with that of the head of the Celestial Empire. Mr. A. said that in offering the resolution he was actuated by no motive but a desire for information as to what was passing between the United States and China at this time, and whether any officer, representing the interests of this country, had been recognised by that power.

Mr. CUSHING was glad that his colleague had introduced the resolution calling for information on so important a subject. He thought, however, that information not less valuable might be obtained from the files of the Navy Department, and hoped an amendment would be accepted to embrace that Department. He therefore proposed to amend the resolution by adding "State or other Departments."

This amendment was accepted by Mr. ADAMS, and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved to reconsider the vote by which, on yesterday, the bill introduced by Mr. HAND, for establishing a uniform rule of naturalization, was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

At the suggestion of several members, Mr. D. consented that the motion should lie over until tomorrow.

Mr. LINCOLN submitted the following resolutions, which were agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House, what "subordinate custom-house officers have been dispensed with within the period of two years" past, to which he refers in his late report on the state of the finances; and what had been the rate of compensation previously paid to these officers for their services. And, also, what additional number of custom-house officers have been appointed, or employed, within the same period, in the several collection districts in the United States, and at what rates of compensation, with the dates of their appointment and employment, respectively. Also, in what cases, and to what extent, "the compensation of officers and light-house keepers has been reduced." And, also, in what cases (if any) the compensation to any officers in his Department employed in the collection of the customs, or otherwise, has been increased. And that he present the required information in such tabular form as to exhibit the comparative number of officers, and the amount of their compensation in each collection district, at the commencement and close of the said period of two years next preceding the date of the said annual report on the finances, and also the relative cost of collecting the revenue from customs to the amount of revenue collected each of the last two years, compared with the cost of collection and the amount collected annually since the 4th day of March, 1825. And that he also inform this House what officers "now employed in the collection of duties, whose further services, it has been believed, could be safely dispensed with, in consequence of the reduction of late years at the different places where they are stationed, may be discontinued, whose offices cannot be dispensed with without new legislation."

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House under what superintendence the custom houses in New York and Boston, respectively, are being constructed; the number and names of the commissioners employed to superintend the construction of said custom-houses; the time they have been so employed; and the compensation paid to each.

Mr. DELLET submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for completing the census in those States or districts where the same has been prevented by sickness, or other causes which the officers having that duty in charge could not control.

Mr. DELLET gave notice of his intention either to-morrow, or on some subsequent day of the session, to ask leave to introduce

A bill to relinquish to Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act of her admission into the Union, to be applied to the making of a road or roads leading to the State;

A bill for the relief of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company; and

A bill making appropriations for completing the improvements of the harbor of Mobile.

Mr. PETRIKIN submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the fees and emoluments of district attorneys of the United States, or of directing such fees and emoluments beyond a limited amount to be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. CLIFFORD, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for the settlement of the claim of the State of Maine for the services of her militia; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to this House, at as early a day as may be convenient to the Department, a list of the reservations under the Creek treaty of March, 1832, which remain unsold, together with the valuations thereof, made under the authority of Governor Carroll, former agent, and the names of the persons making such valuations, the time at which the same were made, and the remarks of said valuations in each case.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War report to this House what progress has been made in the settlement of the conflicting claims for Creek reservations betwixt J. C. Watson and Co. and other claimants; at which time a special commission was appointed to adjudicate the same; who is the person appointed; whether he has received his per diem pay; and at what rate since his appointment, and at what time his duties under said commission will probably be brought to a close.

Mr. CUSHING submitted the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision by law for the trial of crimes in the district courts of the United States. Also, further provision for the institution of civil and admiralty powers in said courts.

Mr. TILLINGHAST called up for consideration the following resolution, submitted by him on the 10th inst.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House how far, and in what manner, the act passed at the last session, entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," has been carried into execution; whether any buildings, additions to, or alterations in, buildings therein authorized or required, have been commenced; at what cost, or contracts therefor made, or orders therefor given, and the terms and conditions of such contracts and orders; what number of clerks, special agents, and other officers, agents, or servants, have been and now are employed under the provisions of said act, or for aid in carrying the same into effect, and where, and from what times, and at what compensations; whether each and every of the officers who are therein required to give bond have given bond, and the sum, sureties, and time of delivery of each bond; and who, if any, have not given bond; whether, in the collection, or keeping, or transfer, or disbursement of the public revenue, or any portion thereof, since said act has been in force, any bank has been resorted to; and, if so, what bank or banks, to what extent, and in what manner, and what propositions have been made, if any, to any bank therefor; and setting forth, also, in what specific manner, whether gold or silver, or notes or certificates, or other and what evidences of deposit or credit, all or any of the revenue has been collected or actually passed from the hands of the person or persons from whom the same was due, to the hands of the officer or officers charged with the immediate collection thereof, since said act has been in force, distinguishing, as nearly as may be, how much has been so collected and paid in each specific matter or medium of payment; also, setting forth how, and in what places or offices, and under what actual and personal custody or keeping, all and any and each portion of the revenue, moneys, and assurances, or evidences of debt or obligation, have been kept during said time; and how and by what agencies and aid, and what forms and process, and on what terms, conditions, and cost of exchange or transfer, and in what specific matter, whether gold and silver, or notes or certificates, or other and what evidences, all, and any portions thereof, have been in said time disbursed and transferred.

Mr. VANDERPOEL saw no benefit which could possibly be derived from the adoption of the resolution. All the effect it would have would be to furnish the clerks in the Treasury Department with employment for the whole winter. Without meaning any disrespect to the gentleman, he (Mr. V.) considered the resolution was offered in the inquisitorial spirit of a true Yankee, and was just what might have been expected from such a quarter. The whole was supererogatory, and he did not believe the information, if obtained, would have the least influence on the gentleman in the vote he might give. He would repeat, that the information sought was unnecessary, and imposing a superfluous labor on the Department, and if it was now pressed, he would feel bound to vote against it.

Mr. TILLINGHAST advocated the resolution and contended that the information sought for was highly desirable. In the course of his remarks, Mr. T. alluded to the resolution recently introduced for the repeal of the Independent Treasury law, on which question, he urged, the recent elections of the whole body of Whigs had turned.

Mr. DUNCAN denied that the Whig elections had turned upon that principle. The law in question had not been made the issue. No pledge had been given by the Whigs, from their candidate for the Presidency downwards, for it was well known throughout the country that when interrogated as to his principles, he refused to give any answer whatever.

Mr. MORGAN thought the issue had been made at least in the district of Cincinnati, where the people had elected one Pendleton in the place of that gentleman.

Mr. DUNCAN said he denied it. It was not so, and he could maintain it.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. GALBRAITH moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. TOLAND moved a call of the House.

Mr. GALBRAITH then withdrew his motion.

Mr. BEATTY renewed it.

Mr. TOLAND persisted in his motion for a call of the House; and, on the question being put, there was no quorum.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS,

The House then adjourned.

FINANCES OF THE COUNTRY.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WRIGHT on Monday last, to refer so much of the President's message as relates to the finances of the country to the Committee on Finance, which had been postponed on the motion of Mr. WEBSTER, coming up for consideration,

Mr. WRIGHT said the honorable Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER,) had felt it to be his duty to open this discussion upon the message of the President, pending a simple motion to refer the portions of it to which he had alluded, to the appropriate Committee of the Senate, under the apprehension expressed by him that the publication and distribution of the statements and views of the President might produce erroneous impressions upon the minds of the people of the country. A similar apprehension entertained by Mr. WRIGHT as to the remarks of the Senator, moved him to make this reply to that gentleman. A belief that his remarks were calculated to give erroneous impressions as to the message, and the fiscal condition of the country at the present time, made it his duty to notice some of the positions and arguments of the honorable Senator, and to correct, as far as he might be able, the errors of fact and conclusion, which seemed to him to have been committed. This he intended to do as briefly as possible; and in the discussion he should endeavor to imitate the courtesy which had so clearly distinguished the language and manner of the honorable Senator.

The Senator first referred to page eight of the message, where the President speaks of a National Debt and a National Bank. The Senator did not, at that time, consider it within his object to make any remarks in reference to the President's observations as to a Bank; but it was to the views expressed in the message on the subject of a national debt to which his attention was directed, and to which his attention was directed with that point and force which always characterize the Senator's mind, and he might perhaps say, on this occasion, the ingenuity which sometimes characterizes his arguments. He had asked if the President supposed, or if any body supposed, that there was a party in this country friendly to a national debt, per se. He (Mr. WRIGHT) did not believe that position met the President's remarks at all, for he did not understand the President as offering his views and urging his reasons against the contraction and perpetuation of a national debt on the ground that it was a debt to be contracted for the single and sole love of the debt for itself. He understood the President as taking other and higher ground, and as endeavoring to impress upon his countrymen, on the occasion which called forth that message, the evils of debt under any circumstances, however, under whatever circumstances, and for whatever consideration contracted, and attempting to convince them that it should be avoided at all times and upon all occasions, and for all considerations, when the safety and honor of the nation will permit. Such he understood to be the drift and purport of the message upon this very important topic. Yet he (Mr. W.) was prepared to go farther than the President had gone, and say what he had not said. He would say, not that there is a political party in this country in favor of a national debt, per se; but that there are interests in this country so in favor of a national debt—interests which ever had, do now, and ever will favor the existence and perpetuation of a national debt, per se, for itself, for the advantages they derive from it. He believed those interests existed in every civilized country—he believed they were ever active—and he believed they constituted an influence, against which it was one of the prominent objects of the President to warn Congress and the country. What are those interests which naturally favor a national debt, per se; a national debt for itself, and for the benefit to be derived from its existence? Retired capitalists, men who have withdrawn from business, with a capital which they wish to preserve for themselves and their families, constitute one such interest. Such persons naturally desire a permanent and safe investment for their money; and it is most rational that they should vastly prefer their country as their debtors, if it be of good standing and credit, to any other. Look at England. What supports and perpetuates the aristocracy of wealth there but the British national debt? It rests upon the debt, and could not be sustained without it, and the indebtedness of the country is its strength and power. Mr. W. said he spoke not of this interest, as now existing in this country, in censure; it was as natural as existence itself; it must grow up in every prosperous community; will ever exist in some form, and can only be curbed and controlled by a people and Government free from debt.

But was there not another interest, and an important one in every commercial community, which was benefited by, and therefore was in favor of the existence of a national debt for itself? He spoke of that great interest connected with foreign commerce, and desirous of a medium of convenient remittance between its own and foreign countries. Why, he had seen frequently the utility of a national debt pressed upon the country for this cause; and quite recently articles had appeared in the public newspapers—and articles written with great ability—stating that since the extinguishment of our debt, fluctuations in our paper system had been more frequent and more deleterious, and contending that the existence of a national debt, and its influence on commercial transactions, were necessary to give that system stability. But a year ago, a proposition was deliberately put forth of that character, recommending that this country should create a debt, not singly to furnish these commercial accommodations, but urging that these would be necessary incidental benefits, while other great objects, valuable in the mind of the writer, were supposed to warrant the contraction of the proposed debt of hundreds of millions. These were not all.

There was a third interest, which embraced that class of enterprising, acute persons, who seek a living, and their fortunes, by dealing in stocks—the class of brokers. They, as a class of men, must be attached to a national debt per se, for nothing could be more desirable in the stock market than an abundance of national stocks and securities, and that abundance of customers, seeking investments and a market, which a full supply of superior stocks would never fail to present to that department of trade. Such securities, too, must have a tendency to keep the prices of stocks more stable, and thus render the profits of the broker more certain, and his calling more safe, if not more lucrative.

A further interest, having the same natural tendency, was the money incorporations of the country, authorized to deal in stocks and exchange, or practically so dealing, with or without authority. These institutions, more naturally than the brokers, must favor the existence of a national debt, per se, inasmuch as the profits of their business would be equally involved, while their own stability would be much more essentially promoted. He did not enumerate this interest with any political reference. It was an existing interest in our country, and in every commercial country in the world; and it would, most likely, continue to exist, so long as trade and commerce existed. Properly restrained, it was a healthful interest to trade and commerce, while, without restraint, it was a fearful interest. It was always active, and at times powerful beyond the careless estimate of a confiding people. Yet it was an interest which a people free from debt need not fear, but from which any people loaded with debt, public or private, had every thing to apprehend. It was a corporate interest, representing no feeling to which human beings are susceptible, and destitute, from its nature, of all human sympathies.

There was still another interest which should be, in his judgment, in favor of a national debt per se. He referred to the men and interests in the country which favored the establishment and preservation of a National Bank as an institution to regulate our currency and credit. He did not speak of this interest as that of a political party in the country, or as connected with any existing political party. His object was to follow the course of argument of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and take a financial view of the topics under discussion; and he believed in his heart that every man who desired the establishment and perpetuation of a National Bank in the United States, should desire, as the only safe and secure foundation for such an institution, a permanent national debt. In his opinion, that was the only safe corner stone, the only secure defence, for a National Bank in this country. It was not his object, upon the present occasion, to question the patriotism, or purity of purpose, of any friend of a National Bank. He would not, if he could avoid it, make this discussion political, much less partisan.

He had looked at our own history, and found that a national debt had been the apology, and, as he thought, the controlling cause, of our two former National Banks; and he believed further, that the existence and continuance of the debt had given to both the most of the permanency and stability which they had manifested to the country, as money institutions controlling our currency and credit.

He had also referred himself to the pecuniary institutions of England, and became equally satisfied that the National Bank there could not sustain itself for an hour, with its conceded power over the paper system of that commercial country, if disconnected from the British national debt. The capital of the bank consists of the debt, and the country is its debtor for the credit it commands. How, then, is the country to get rid of the bank but by the payment of the debt, and how can the debtor, though the proudest Government in the world, control the creditor, while these embarrassing relations exist? It cannot be done, and hence the Bank of England must be as enduring as the debt of England.

So here. So every where. When a Government is in debt, and requires a permanent credit beyond its means of payment, it may require a Government bank to manage and regulate its fiscal affairs; to extend credit when its necessities require, and so regulate private business as to make that extension safe and profitable to itself.

He must then repeat, that, in his judgment, every man and every interest, in this country, favorable to a National Bank should be also favorable to a national debt, as the only safe foundation upon which such a superstructure can be erected with any reasonable promise of permanency.

He must conclude, therefore, that there were in this country interests, strong, powerful, and active interests, in favor of a national debt per se; that these interests have favored, do now favor, and will continue to favor the contraction and perpetuation of a national debt for the advantages which they may derive from it, and that the President was wise in warning his countrymen against their influence in this direction. Other interests might be added to the enumeration, but these were sufficient to elucidate the argument, and show the danger to be constantly apprehended.

The honorable Senator, if Mr. Wright had understood him correctly, admitted that the views of the President, as expressed in his message, upon the subject of a national debt, were correct and sound, but seemed to question his right to give them to his countrymen, because, as he contended, they were contrary to the practice of the Administration, and of the President as its head.

To prove this position, he asserts that the present is the first Administration, under our institutions, which has begun a national debt in time of peace. The assertion is true; and yet is it a presentation of the point intended to be discussed? Is it calculated to do justice to the President, or to his administration? Why did not the Senator tell us that the administration of General Jackson was the first, under our institutions, which ever paid a national debt? It would have been as true; and yet the assertion, presented in this way, would have been calculated to do injustice to every Administration preceding that of General Jackson. The fact is that no Administration, prior to that of Mr. Van Buren, had ever existed, under our Constitution, which could begin a national debt, because every preceding Administration had found a national debt in existence. Such a debt was contracted during the war of the Revolution, before our present Government was formed, and was first finally extinguished during the administration of General Jackson; and yet he believed he was safe in saying that every Administration had borrowed money, and thus added to the existing debt, and had made payments towards its extinguishment. While, therefore, it was true that no Administration, prior to that of Mr. Van Buren, had begun a debt, either in a time of peace or war, and that no Administration, prior to that of General Jackson, had paid off and extinguished our national debt, it was also true that all Administrations, as well in peace as war, had borrowed money, contracted debts, and paid debts. The simple assertion of the Senator, then, that Mr. Van Buren's was the first Administration which had begun a debt in time of peace, did not, in his judgment—and he pronounced the opinion with deference—present fairly to the country the President, or his administration.

It might be proper here to remark, that if the subsequent positions of the Senator were sound, no debt had been begun under Mr. Van Buren's administration, because a national debt had not ceased to exist. That which had been created as our national debt in our laws and in our fiscal accounts, was extinguished during the administration of General Jackson; but if the items of Indian and other claims referred to by the Senator, are to be set down as items of national debt, then has our national debt never been paid, and the administration of Mr. Van Buren cannot have "begun" such a debt.

The true and fair question is, however, why and under what circumstances has any portion of debt been contracted under this Administration?

It would not be necessary for him, Mr. W. said, to spend much time in answering this inquiry, as most of the Senators present were members of the body in 1837, and would retain personal recollections of the whole matter. All would remember that Congress was convened extraordinarily, for the single purpose of supplying the Treasury and enabling it to preserve the public faith and honor; that this call was not made at a time of scarcity or want in the public funds; but when our revenues were most abundant, when we had millions on deposit with the banks, and millions due from them; that their inability to pay the drafts of the Treasurer, in conformity with the laws of Congress, created the want and compelled the call of Congress; and that the same inability of the banks compelled us, by the admission of all, to borrow money upon the credit of the people to keep the National Treasury in operation.

This new debt was not, then, contracted, or, in the language of the Senator, "began," because the extravagance of the Administration had expended our substance. No, but because our trustees—because those with whom the money of the people had been placed for safe keeping, could not pay upon demand according to our laws—because our millions upon millions were without our control, in the keeping of banking institutions, and the credit of the people was resorted to to sustain the faith and honor of the country. What was the extent of the power then conferred upon the Administration to contract a debt? If his recollection served him, it was $10,000,000. And what were our dues from the banks alone? If he was not mistaken, some thirteen or fourteen million of dollars; and beyond that, one of the prominent and worthy objects of the loan was to extend indulgence upon duty bonds to the merchants of the country, who were equally distressed with the public treasury from the revulsions of the time. Under such circumstances it was that the present Administration "began a debt in time of peace."

The next position of the honorable Senator is that the administration of Mr. Van Buren has expended much more money annually than the accruing revenue. That he (Mr. Wright) believed to be true; but he did not propose to follow the Senator at all in the data given to prove the position; he would say what he was sure would not be controverted, that the Administration had expended, year by year, just so much and no more money than Congress had appropriated and ordered to be expended—that every year the appropriations of Congress had exceeded by millions the estimates of expenditure presented to it by the Executive Departments—and that it was a matter for Congress to provide the means to meet the expenditures itself directed. But it would not have been unjust to that Administration if the honorable Senator had said, in passing, that during every year of its existence, the mass of the public expenditures had been materially and rapidly reduced. The expenditures of 1838 were shown by the President's message and the Secretary's report, the two documents to which the Senator had referred in this discussion, to be less than of 1837. Those of 1839 were some six millions less; those for 1840 had been from two to three millions less than those for 1839, and the estimates for 1841 were materially less than those for any preceding year. This, then, was both sides of the book—it was the present Administration as it is, in reference to expenditure. During its term, those expenditures had been undergoing a rapid reduction, from the commencement of its four years to the present hour. This was a just and entire view of the matter.

The next position taken by the honorable Senator was the most material one in his argument, and without which Mr. W. might not have felt himself called upon to make this reply. The Senator did not even assert his point; but, in a manner most courteous, expressed his opinion that the President had made a variety of mistakes and omissions in his statement of the present national debt, as given in his message; that the country is, in fact, more in debt than the President and Secretary of the Treasury have represented it to be; and that, without his correction of these mistakes, these excesses of debt might be charged over to the coming Administration, and the present might retire under appearances more favorable than the facts would warrant.

To examine these opinions and apprehensions of the honorable Senator, and to try them by the facts, should now be his aim and effort, and was the purpose which had principally induced him to appear before the Senate upon the present occasion.

It was admitted that the President had referred to the balance of outstanding Treasury notes truly. He had stated that the amount undecreed did not exceed four and a half millions of dollars, but the complaint was that he had represented that as the whole debt of the country at the present time, and as the amount which would constitute the whole debt at the time when he should hand over the administration of its affairs to his successor. Now, how had the Senator sought to show that the President had been mistaken? By referring to what was called the trust funds; and principally, and he believed entirely, to those portions of those funds which appertain to the Indians. In reference to the Indian trust funds, he said not that the fact was so, but that, on examination, he was inclined to believe that portions of them had been actually expended for the ordinary uses of the Treasury, and were now a debt resting upon the country; that the moneys stipulated by Indian treaties to be invested had not been all invested, but that some hundreds of thousands of dollars of those moneys had been paid out and expended, and were now a debt against the Treasury. He (Mr. Wright) had taken as much pains to obtain information upon these points as the time which had elapsed since the Senator's remarks were made would permit; and as he designed to state the facts fairly, plainly, and truly, as far as he was able, and as the various Indian treaties varied in their provisions as to the trusts constituted under them, and conferred upon the United States, he would be compelled to speak of certain treaties and certain trusts separately, each by itself, to make himself understood, and to enable others to understand the facts. He would refer, then, in the first place, to the treaty with the Chickasaw Indians, as that treaty was peculiar, and the trust constituted and assumed was novel in our dealings with the Indian tribes. In this case, the United States had become the voluntary trustee of the Chickasaws, and had stipulated to sell their lands as the public domain of the United States; sold, to deduct simply the expenses of the treaty, of the survey and sale of the lands, and such other expenses as might be incurred for account of the Indians, not including any commissions or other compensation to the trustee, and to account to them for all the moneys which shall remain unexpended. In other words, the treaty binds the United States to sell the lands of these Indians to the best advantage, to account to them for the whole proceeds, and to manage such of their cash funds as shall remain in the hands of the Government, without charge for trouble or responsibility.

Upon inquiry at the Treasury Department, he learned that a law of Congress had placed the principal part of the money to be received under this treaty in charge of the head of that department, for the purpose of investment; that small portions belonging to Chickasaw orphans and to certain members of the tribe denominated "incompetent Chickasaws," remained in charge of the Secretary of War; that of the money in charge of the Secretary of the Treasury, all has been invested, over and above the portion consumed in expenses in conformity with the treaty, which there has been time to invest since the receipt; that the money is mostly paid in at the Pontiac land office, in the State of Mississippi, and some time is required to get the returns of sales, and to bring the money into the Treasury; that there may be now from $20,000 to $30,000 of these funds in the land offices, in transitu, and in the Treasury, but that no portions of them have been expended for the general uses of the Treasury, and that investments are invariably made as soon as the sum accumulated is sufficient to authorize a negotiation for stocks. The honorable Senator will see, therefore, that his conjecture that some three or four hundred thousand dollars of these funds had been expended is mistaken, and that no addition to the public debt is to be sought in this quarter.

Whether or not there were small sums arising under this treaty in the care of the War Department, and not yet invested, he did not know, as time had not allowed him to call upon the head of that Department for the information. Still he supposed this information immaterial for this argument, as money in the charge of the War Department could not be in the Treasury, and therefore could not be reached by a warrant upon the Treasury, or expended in the ordinary calls upon it.

It was proper here to remark further that the only Indian money in the charge of the Secretary of the Treasury for investment is the portion of the Chickasaw fund before pointed out. All those moneys, arising under other treaties, are, by the treaties, committed to the charge of the Secretary of War, and Congress has not yet transferred their custody to the Treasury.

Investments of Indian moneys, to large amounts, had been made both under the direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury, and accounts of the transactions had been laid before Congress. The honorable Senator had referred to them, and had spoken of the prices in some cases paid for stocks, in a manner to give the impression that he suspected the investments had not been prudently and cautiously made. Mr. Wright believed all the investments had been confined to stocks of the States, a description of security which he felt sure that Senator would not willingly depreciate or disparage, and if he would refer to the dates of the respective investments, and to the prices current of the stocks in the principal markets of the country, at the several periods, little ground would be discovered for complaint upon this point.

He would now pass to another class of references made by the honorable Senator, and where, in the opinion of Mr. Wright, he approximated more nearly to the discovery of a debt, technically speaking, which is not noticed by the President. He alluded to the Senator's reference to several Indian treaties in a group, viz:

One with the Ottawas and Chippewas,	$200,000
" Osages,	69,120
" Delawares,	46,080
" Sioux of Mississippi,	300,000
" Sacs and Foxes of Mississippi,	200,000
" Sacs and Foxes of Missouri,	157,400
" Winnebagoes,	1,100,000
" Creeks,	350,000

These treaties severally stipulate that the sums above named shall be invested by the United States for the benefit of the several tribes of Indians named, and he believed it to be true that, as yet, none of the sums had been invested, but that Congress had preferred to appropriate annually the interest upon them, as a part of the current annual expenses of the country. All of the treaties except one, that with the Delawares, had been concluded since the commencement of the year 1837, and his information was that, in all the cases, very few sales of the lands, ceded by the respective treaties, had yet been made; not enough, in many cases, to cover the expenses of the treaties, and in none sufficient to bring into the Treasury any considerable portion of the capital required to be invested.

Another reason exists for the non-investment of these sums, which has its foundation in the Constitution of the country. It is that Congress has neither provided nor appropriated the money required to make the investment; and without an appropriation by law, neither the Secretary of the Treasury, nor the President, can take money from the Treasury for these or any other purposes. The treaties create the liability against the United States for the $2,580,100, but it is not a debt within the law, and cannot be noticed as such by the fiscal officer, until Congress recognise it, and provide for it by the proper constitutional appropriation. The treaties are the acts of the President and Senate, the treaty making power of the country, but Congress and the President, the law making power, can alone pay money even under a treaty. If then every acre of the land ceded by the Indians, and purchased by and for the benefit of the United States under these several treaties, were to be sold to-morrow, and the money paid into the Treasury, neither the Secretary of War, nor the Secretary of the Treasury, nor any other person, could legally, or constitutionally, invest one dollar of it, or pay it out under any provision of the treaties, until Congress shall have appropriated it by law, and directed its application. In these cases, as he had before said, the lands had not been sold, the money had not come into the Treasury, and Congress had preferred rather to appropriate the annual interest, than to borrow the money in advance, for the single purpose of funding it.

He cheerfully admitted that the amount was a debt, as far as the treaty-making power could impose a debt upon the country; but it was not a liability upon the Treasury, within the laws of Congress, and could not, therefore, be recognised as a debt by the Secretary of the Treasury, in presenting the state of the Treasury, its means and liabilities, to Congress. The Government was bound to pay the interest upon these sums to the Indians, or forfeit its faith, pledged through the treaty-making power, or it was bound to invest the principle so that the Indians might receive the interest from other debtors. Congress had exercised its option, and preferred to appropriate the interest simply, and wait the sale of the lands to realize the capital to be invested.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, does it not follow, from the very nature of the transactions between the parties? The Indians sell and convey their lands to the United States, and surrender the title and possession together, upon the faith of treaty stipulations. In consideration of the lands sold, the United States agree to hold certain portions of the purchase money, and invest them for the Indians. The United States alone are trustee, and the receipt by the Indians of the annual interest upon the sums to be invested is a good compliance with the contract to them. Would it not be a perfect technical compliance, if the Government were, by way of investment, to issue to the Indians its own stocks? And can it be material, so long as the United States choose to remain the debtors, whether this form be gone through with, or the treaty be left as the evidence of liability, and Congress annually appropriate the interest on the money as it would upon the stocks? It seemed to him that the inquiry of the Senator raised a distinction without a difference of interest on either side, and questioned the right of Congress to its option in a case where the option could not but exist from the nature of the transactions. The most the Indians can claim is the liability of the United States for the interest and principal of their money. That they have by the solemnity of treaty stipulations, while the money is not invested. When it shall be, they may have securities of a less desirable character, but in conformity with their contract. The only question, then, which could influence Congress, in its option, was the interest of this Government and the convenience of its Treasury.

Could it be wise for Congress, in the fulfilment of treaties of this character, and with such parties, and at a time when there was not a surplus of money in the Treasury, to have directed loans upon the credit of the people for the payment of debts, the payment of which was not a matter of feeling or interest with the creditor, and for the eventual payment of which an ample fund had been provided by the terms of the contract which made the debt? Could loans have been made at a rate of interest less than that stipulated to be paid to the Indians? That will not be pretended.

Where, then, is the cause of complaint, or of fault? It is simply in the assumption that here is a debt not mentioned by the President, and still a debt against the public Treasury and the people of the country.

Is this so, in the sense in which the complaint has been preferred by the honorable Senator against the message of the President? Mr. WRIGHT had admitted that there was a liability to pay, and an ample fund in the lands ceded by the Indian treaties to make the payment, and had attempted to show that Congress had acted wisely in appropriating the interest upon the money merely, until the sale of the lands should bring into the Treasury interest and principal, and thus enable the investment to be made without the contraction of a permanent debt.

Was there any thing in all this new or singular, or peculiar to this Administration? How long had this Government been making treaties with the Indians for the purchase of their land, and contracting obligations with them? And if these are items of the public debt, why not their annuities for the purchase of the same lands, which are of a large amount? They are debts in the nature of investments, but they are never reported as part of the public debt of the country. Neither are to be found in any report heretofore made from the financial department of the Government, under any Administration which has ever existed, as items of our public debt. They are not so by the law, and they have never been so treated in practice. He had in his possession a document which he had obtained for another purpose, and which contained a schedule of the entire Indian treaties up to last year. He should think—for he had not taken the trouble to count them—that there were several hundreds, and on casting his eye over them this morning, he found they commenced, at the latest, as early as 1790, and had been made constantly, if not strictly annually, up to this time.

The practice of stipulating to invest sums of capital, though not new in the administration of our Indian affairs, had greatly increased within the last few years. He had had occasion to become personally acquainted with an old case. He referred to the deposit, by the Seneca Indians of New York, of the sum of $100,000 with the United States, being part of the consideration money for their possessory title to their reservations under the stipulation on the part of this Government, as he was informed and believes, that they should receive six per cent. interest upon their capital so loaned. He spoke from recollection, and would not be confident, but his impression was that the contract was entered into in 1806. He could further inform the Senator, that, during the administration of John Quincy Adams, this money had been invested in the three per cent. stocks of the United States, then outstanding, and that Congress, while he was a member of the other branch, as he now recollected and believed, appropriated the other $3,000, or about that sum, to make up to the Indians the interest to which they were entitled. This was an old case, and he spoke from memory in regard to it; but from it the honorable Senator could see that, if we were now to go back to the commencement of our Indian relations and bring up a new account of public debt, we should be compelled to look far behind the time of Mr. Van Buren, as well as to begin an entire new calculation of debt. If the honorable Senator would look for the investment of this Seneca fund of $100,000, he thought he would look in vain, and yet it had never appeared in any statement from the Treasury, as an item of our public debt. An estimate for the interest would be found in every annual estimate of expenditure since the redemption of the Government stock in which the last investment was made, but the capital was not mentioned, because it had not been reappropriated for a different investment. Still the Senator would not be disposed to charge this $100,000 to the present Administration, as a debt contracted by it, and to be unjustly palmed off upon its successors.

Yet this was but a fair sample of the policy of going back into these Indian relations to find an existing debt, not disclosed, against the present Administration. If we adopt the idea, we must go back, not to 1806, but to 1790, and bring up the account through all the Administrations which have existed under our Constitution, and then solve the question, whether that Administration is to be most censured for contracting debt, which has succeeded in extinguishing most Indian title to the public domain of the country, or whether the debts so contracted have been and are considered as resting upon a sure fund for their redemption in the lands purchased, while the treaties are, in every other respect, beneficial to the country, to its population and prosperity, and to its Treasury.

He believed the last and the present Administrations had extinguished more Indian titles, and brought more of the public lands into the market, and within the reach of settlement, than any other two, if not more than all preceding Administrations; and, as a necessary consequence, the amounts of purchase money paid, and agreed to be paid, in the shape of annuities, investments, and otherwise, would be greater than under previous Administrations. But what had hitherto been the estimate placed by the country upon such policy successfully prosecuted? Had we been in the habit of setting down these purchases of Indian lands as bad and losing bargains? As imposing burdens upon the Treasury, and debts upon the country? Or as improving the public revenues, and strengthening the Treasury, while they enriched the country? Had it ever been supposed that the lands purchased were not much more than sufficient to pay the debts contracted?

If, however, this movement was the indication of a change of policy by the coming Administration in regard to the lands; if the fund thus provided to pay these debts is to be separated from the debts; if the lands, or their proceeds, are to be given away, and the liabilities incurred under the Indian treaties are to be left unpaid upon the hands of this Government, then indeed the amounts due to the Indians, as well in annuities as investments, or otherwise, may justly be counted as debts, as permanent, enduring debts, only to be paid by taxation upon the people. He would tell the Senator, however, that that Administration, and that party, which shall adopt this new policy, and give away the lands without discharging these obligations incurred for their purchase, will be the Administration and the party which will charge these sums upon the people as debts, and which must bear the responsibility of the act.

The honorable Senator proposes to have a new set of books opened, to protect the next Administration from the debts and liabilities incurred by this; to establish what he calls "a rest" between them. Mr. WRIGHT would go with him to do this; but he should insist that the accounts be fairly stated, and the books fairly kept; that when the Senator had charged the administration of Mr. Van Buren with the debts due to the Indians, he should credit it with the lands which formed the consideration for the debts. In this way, the account would present the whole truth, and he did not fear the responsibility of balancing the book so kept.

He was aware that one most expensive treaty had been made, not by this, but the last Administration, without profit to this Government. He referred to the last treaty with the Cherokees, for the extinguishment of their title to their lands. These lands were principally in the State of Georgia, and the Indian title was extinguished for the benefit of that State, and not of the National Treasury. Yet this treaty was but a late fulfilment of an obligation resting upon this Government in favor of that State, and almost as old as the Government itself; an obligation entered into to acquire its title to a large portion of the public domain, and upon which, therefore, the moneys paid and payable under that treaty are justly chargeable, and from the proceeds of which they should be reimbursed to the public Treasury.

Still, this treaty being included, the proceeds of the public lands would clear all former Administrations, as well as the present, from any responsibility for debts contracted under Indian treaties. Let the new set of books, then, show both sides of the account, and contain a full and fair statement of the whole matter, and we shall not hear that this or any other Administration has run the country in debt by the extinguishment of the Indian title to our immense public domain. Let the proceeds of the lands stand against the moneys paid and the liabilities incurred, and see if there have been bad and unprofitable and losing bargains.

Is this to be charged at this day, and from that quarter? How long is it since we heard a very different account of these Indian contracts? Since he had been honored with a seat here, the charge had been made in this chamber, and repeated much more loudly and widely out of it, that our Indian policy was a swindling policy; that we were purchasing their lands for a song, and driving them to the ends of the earth for a resting place. Then, the charge was that we were making cruel bargains with the ignorant savages, the poor Indians! Now, it is that this Administration has been loading the country with debt by making these same bargains. It will not do, said Mr. W.; it is too soon to make this short turn, and wholly change the character of the complaints growing out of our Indian relations. The facts will not sustain the last position. The bargains, as a whole, have been profitable, vastly profitable, to the public treasury, and the lands yet unsold constitute a fund a hundred fold more than sufficient to discharge every remaining liability. So much for this mode of showing the President in error in his statement of our public debt.

The honorable Senator proceeded to enumerate other heads, under which he did not assert, but expressed his suspicion that there were existing debts. He did not attempt to enumerate items of debt, and it was impossible for Mr. WRIGHT to conjecture what the items were, or for what the debts were suspected to have been contracted. The heads enumerated were, debts for the public works, debts for the Florida war, debts for Indian depredations at the north, and debts for other things.

Well, now as to the debts for public works; there might be such, but he (Mr. WRIGHT) did not know what they were—he did not know that there were any. He was sure it could not be possible that the Senator intended simply to inform us that there were public works commenced which it was the interest of the country to prosecute, and that money was to be appropriated for them. And if there was a debt for public works, other than such a prospective obligation, he was ignorant of it. If that description of account was to be opened, he would abandon the discussion with the single remark that the honorable Senator would be fortunate if he found the new Administration clear of obligations of that character, either at its commencement or its close.

What was the debt growing out of the Florida war? He (Mr. WRIGHT) was ignorant of it, unless it consisted of claims for losses sustained by citizens in consequence of that war; and did any man suppose that the President of the United States, or the Secretary of the Treasury, was authorized to present those claims to the country as a part of its public debt? Are they so, in fact? They have been presented year after year, and session after session, to the Congress of the United States, and a Congress has not yet been found to recognise a dollar of them. And were the executive officers, in the face of this action of Congress, to declare them public debts, to state their amount, and call upon Congress for provision for their payment? The slightest reflection would convince the Senator that such was a very uncertain and dangerous way to make up an amount of debt. It would be nothing short of Executive usurpation of a fearful character.

Then the debts for Indian depredations at the North—as, if he understood the Senator correctly, this was one of his heads of enumeration—he knew nothing of them—he knew not what or where they were?

But there were "debts for other things;" yet; why did not the honorable Senator bring in the five millions for French spoils previous to the year 1800? That was as much a debt as the others. It was a claim not recognised by Congress. The honorable Senator believed it was a debt; he (Mr. WRIGHT) did not. Why not call up the pension list? That is a debt which we must pay until the gallant old soldiers are no more. It was just as properly presented as the Indian annuities. Why not present the claims of the heirs of the late Robert Fulton? Many supposed that a just debt. The Mead claim? Many thought similarly of that. In short, why not present the ten thousand claims which their Secretary told him would, in a day or two, be inventoried, under a resolution of the Senate of the last session? There are ten thousand claims on the files of the two Houses of Congress, and are they debts, to be charged to the administration of Mr. Van Buren? Was this to be done before Congress had recognised their justice, or made them debts at all? He hoped not, and he believed not.

Again, the honorable Senator said, if he (Mr. WRIGHT) understood him aright, that the Secretary of the Treasury had authorized the assumption that this Administration was to throw a balance of debt on the next, by the a ion that he did not anticipate the payment of the outstanding Treasury notes previous to March, 1842.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that he was not conscious of having stated that.

Mr. WRIGHT did not wish to misrepresent the Senator, but he had so understood him, and so read his remarks, published in the Intelligencer of this morning. He would, however, refer to the 7th page of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the present year, now upon our tables, to prove that such was not his anticipation, but that he expected the revenues of 1841 would meet the expenses of that year, redeem the whole outstanding balance of four and a half millions of Treasury notes, and leave in the Treasury, in money, on the 1st of January, 1842, the sum of $824,273:

The statement of the Secretary is as follows:

"More details concerning the estimates of the next year will be proper, and will illustrate the correctness of some of the preceding results.

It may be stated, from the best data in possession of this Department, that the receipts, under the existing laws, will probably be as follows:

From customs	-	-	$19,000,000
From lands	-	-	3,500,000
From miscellaneous	-	-	80,000
Add the expected balance in the Treasury, available on the 1st of January next	-	-	1,580,855

The aggregate of ordinary means for the next year would then be 24,160,855

There will be nothing more, either of principal or interest, due from banks, which is likely to be made available, except about 223,000

A power will exist, under the act of 31st March, 1840, to issue Treasury notes till a year from its passage expires, but not to make the whole emission outstanding at any one time exceed five millions of dollars.

This will furnish additional means, equal to the computed amount which can be issued at the close of the present year, being about 342,618

Hence, there may be added, from these several sources, so much as to make the whole means for the next year 24,723,473

On the other hand, the expenditures for 1841, for ordinary purposes, if Congress make no reduction in the appropriations requested by the different departments, are estimated at 19,250,000

This would leave a balance in the Treasury, at the close of the year, equal to 5,473,473

But certain payments must also be made on account of the funded and unfunded debt, unless Congress authorize contracts to be formed for extending the time of their payment. Thus, there will be required, On account of the funded debt, chiefly for the cities of this District $149,200 For the redemption of Treasury notes, if all the others be issued which can be under the present law; as then the amount returned within A. D. 1841 will probably not exceed 4,500,060

Estimated balance in the Treasury at the close of the next year, after all payments whatever $824,273"

It was not then supposed by the Secretary, that this debt of four and a half millions was to be thrown over to 1842. He expressly anticipated its payment in 1841. He would now pass very briefly to other topics.

The honorable Senator complained that the President, in his message, and the Secretary, in his report, had made reference to the money on deposit with the States, and called, with earnestness, to know whether the President, or the Secretary, had recommended the withdrawal of that money, or any part of it. He (Mr. WRIGHT) found no such recommendation, and for the best of all reasons, in his judgment—there was no necessity for it; the revenue of the year 1841 was expected to be equal to the expenditures of 1841, including the redemption of four and a half millions of Treasury notes. The deposit with the States was referred to as an item of property, belonging to this Government, but was not mentioned as in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, or of the President. It was in the hands of Congress, an accumulation of former years, when taxation was heavier than at the present time, and was referred to, to show that there was no cause for increased taxation upon the people; that the Government, as such, was possessed of means to discharge every existing liability, and to present a balance of some seventeen or eighteen millions, for the future disposition of the National Legislature. This certainly could be no just cause of complaint. The President and the Secretary had been in the exercise of most responsible trusts. They were about to surrender them to others, who would seem more directly to represent the public will and choice. It was their duty to present a true and full account of the public property and the public interests, as they supposed them to exist, and surely a reference to an interest of some twenty-eight millions of safely invested money could not be considered singular or censurable.

The honorable Senator had seen fit further to complain that the President had not recommended a modification of the tariff and an increase of taxation. Why should he have done so? The calculations and representations of the responsible officer, charged with that duty, showed that more revenue was not required for the contemplated service of the coming year. Why then should the President have recommended measures for an increase of revenue?

If there had been a just anticipation of a deficiency of means to meet the wants of the Treasury, it would have been incumbent upon him, as it would upon the Secretary, to have pointed out the mode, and recommended the measures, to supply that deficiency. Such did not appear to be their anticipations, and their communications to Congress had been made to conform to their sense of their public duties. It might have been very uncharitable in him, but when the Senator was indulging in his remarks upon this point, he could not but feel that the gentlemen were impressed with the exceedingly difficult question, the many knotty points, which the adjustment of the tariff is likely to present to the coming Administration; and that it was the manifest interest of the now dominant party in the country that poor defeated Mr. Van Buren should come in and make an effort to settle it in advance. It could not fail to be seen that portions of that triumphant party would complain of any thing which any man could recommend upon this subject, and the Senator might kindly suppose that complaints could not now harm the President.

So far from reciprocating these feelings, Mr. W. rejoiced that it had not been found necessary for the present President to touch this vexed question. And he could not be mistaken in supposing that it would have been indecorous in him, after the tremendous defeat he had experienced at the late elections, to have reached after disputed topics, with a view to their final and permanent adjustment by himself or his friends. He was taking leave of his responsible position, and Mr. W. rejoiced to believe he was doing, what he believed it was alone proper for him to do, confining himself strictly to the discharge of those duties which his short remaining official term required at his hands. In reference to the adjustment of the tariff he had done as he should have done—he had left the whole matter to those who are to come after him, and who should be, as they claim to be, the more immediate and acceptable representatives of the popular will, and he (Mr. W.) did not speak untruly when he said his most ardent wish was that they might be able to adjust that difficult question happily for the country, and satisfactorily to every interest involved.

A single word more, and he would close. The honorable Senator concluded with a remark which manifested a disposition to say that the friends of this Administration were, or were to be made, responsible for the necessity of an extra session of Congress, if a convention of the new Congress should be ordered by the new President. Now he (Mr. WRIGHT) was one of those who should do every thing in his power to obviate any such necessity; and to accomplish that object with the greatest certainty, he should use his utmost endeavors to keep the appropriations of this session within the anticipated means of the year 1841. He believed the estimates supplied all the necessary wants, and he intended to adhere to them strictly. Having done so, he should cheerfully leave it to those who have been placed in power by a triumphant expression of the popular voice, to call a Congress when they pleased, and to recommend such measures as they pleased.

Mr. WRIGHT having concluded,

Mr. WEBSTER said he should detain the Senate but a short time in answer to some of the honorable member's remarks, as he had really not met the argument of Mr. W. yesterday. To begin with the subject of Indian treaties. The honorable member had said that the fund arising from the sale of the Chickasaw lands had all been invested to within some forty or fifty thousand dollars. Mr. W. had founded what he had said in relation to this fund on the returns furnished to the Senate; and, according to that document, the balance uninvested amounted to $360,000; but he had added that he had heard that $90,000 had been invested since the date of the returns. Mr. W. had made no complaint of the mode in which this fund had been invested, so far as it had been invested; and, if the whole of it had been invested, so much the better. But in regard to the two and a half millions of the fund belonging to the Winnebagoes and other tribes, and which, according to the treaty, was to be invested for the benefit of those tribes, Mr. W. asked of the Senate whether Mr. WRIGHT had fairly met the force of the argument he had advanced, (if it had any force to be met?) Mr. W. had not complained of the treaty, nor had he charged the Administration with any extravagance or want of providence in entering into it—that was not the point; the point was, that this amount constituted a debt, for the payment of which it was incumbent on the Government to provide; and that, as such, it ought to be kept before the view of Congress. The honorable member admitted that it was a debt, but contended that it was not to be reckoned in as a portion of the public national debt. If, by this, the honorable member meant to say that this amount formed no part of the debt arising from borrowed money, unquestionably he was right; but still it was a national debt; the nation owed this money; and it entered necessarily, as one important item or element, into a statement of the financial condition of the Government. The honorable member had asked, if this were so, why such a statement ought not, in like manner, to include the Indian annuities? They were included, in effect. Did not the annual report from the Department state the amount of those annuities as part of the expenditures for which Congress was to provide? Are they not always in the estimates? So the member asked why the pensions were not to be included? The same answer might be made. The amount of that expenditure also was annually laid before Congress, and it was provided for as other demands on the Government. Mr. W. had not complained of this amount of two and a half millions of Indian debt; he himself had never opposed these treaties; all he had contended for was, that, as an amount to be provided for, it was as much a part of the public debt as if it had consisted of borrowed money; it was a demand which Congress was bound to meet. In any general view, therefore, of the liabilities of the Government, was there one element of those liabilities which could with more truth and justice be inserted than this?

Mr. W. had said that he commended the argument of the President in opposition to a national debt; and he should be quite unwilling to have it supposed that any thing he said could be wrested (he did not charge that it had been intentionally so wrested) to favor the idea of a public debt at all. But he must still insist that the language employed by the President on the 8th page of his message did refer to past political contests in this country, and did hold out the idea that, from the beginning of the Government, in the political contests which had agitated the country, there had been some men or some parties who were in favor of the creation and manufacture of a public debt, as part of their policy; and this he (Mr. W.) had denied. The idea in the message was not that there were certain great interests in the country which were always, from the nature of things, in favor of such a debt, on account of the advantages derivable from it to themselves, as the honorable member has argued to-day. If the President had stated this, as it had now been stated in the speech of the honorable member, nobody could have taken any exception to it. But that was not the point. The point of objection was, that the message charged this fondness for a national debt upon some one of the parties who had engaged in the past political strifes of the country, and had represented it as a broad and general ground of distinction between parties; that one was the advocate of a national debt as of itself a good, and the other the opponent of the existence of a debt. This he regarded as an imputation wholly unfounded, and it was on this ground that he had objected to that portion of the Executive communication. No facts in our history warranted the allegation. It was mere assumption.

Mr. W. proceeded to say that he had, when before up, omitted one important item in stating the amount of expenditures under the existing Administration beyond the accruing revenue, which ought to be brought to the public view. If he (Mr. W.) was in error, the honorable member would put him right. In March, 1836, a law had passed postponing the payment of certain revenue bonds in consequence of the great fire at New York, for three, four, and five years. The great mass of these had fallen due, and had been received into the Treasury since the present Administration had come into power. The total amount was about six millions of dollars. This being so, then the whole amount of expenditure, over and above the accruing revenue, would amount to thirty-four millions, or thereabouts, and would thus give an annual excess of expenditures over receipts of eight and a half millions a year; and he insisted, again, that, looking at the matter in a purely financial view—looking at the comparative proportion of liabilities and of means to discharge them, when the President found an excess of the former continuing for four years, at the rate of eight and a half millions per annum, and did not particularize any one branch of expenditure in which a considerable practical deduction could be made, (unless so far as it might take place in the pension list by the gradual decease of the pensioners;) and when he proposed no new measure as a means of replenishing the exhausted Treasury, the question for Congress and for the nation to consider was, whether this was a course safe to be pursued in relation to our fiscal concerns? Was it wise, provident, and statesmanlike?

There was one point in which (Mr. W. said) the honorable member from New York had entirely misapprehended him. He (Mr. WRIGHT) had said that Mr. W. appeared to desire to avoid as a critical and delicate subject, the question of the tariff; or, rather, had complained that this Administration had not taken it up. Now he (Mr. W.) had not said a word about the tariff, further than to state that another great reduction was immediately approaching in the rate of duties, of which the message took no notice whatever, while it did not fail to refer to two other reductions which had heretofore taken place. What he (Mr. W.) had said on the subject of imposing new duties for revenue, had reference solely to silks and wines. This had been a delicate point with him at no time. He had for a long period been always desirous to lay such a duty on silks and wines; and it did appear to him the strangest thing imaginable—the strangest phase of the existing system of revenue—that we should import so many millions of dollars' worth of silks and wines entirely free of duty, at the very time when the Government had been compelled, by temporary loans, to keep itself in constant debt for four years past. So far from considering this as a matter of any delicacy, had the Senate the constitutional power of originating revenue bills, the very first thing he should move, in his place, would be to lay a tax on both these articles of luxury.

Were Mr. W. to draw an inference from the speech of the honorable member, it would be that it rather seemed to be his own opinion, and certainly seemed also to be that of the President, that it would be wiser to withdraw the whole or a part of the money deposited with the States than to lay taxes on silks and wines. In this opinion Mr. W. did not at all concur. If the question were between such a withdrawal and the imposition of such a tax, he should without hesitation say, lay the tax, and leave the money with the States where it was. He was greatly mistaken if such a preference did not meet the public approbation. He was for taxing this enormous amount of twenty or thirty millions of foreign products imported in a single year, and all consumed in the country, and consumed, as articles of luxury, by the rich alone, and leaving the deposits in possession of the States with whom they had been placed.

Mr. W. said he believed he had now noticed so much of the honorable Senator's speech as required a reply; and he would resume his seat with again repeating that it had been no part of his purpose to ascribe either extravagance or the opposite virtue to the Administration in the purchase of Indian lands, or other transactions. That was not his object, or his point. He only wished to present a true financial view of the condition of our affairs, and to show that our national debt was much greater and more serious than a hasty reader of the President's message might be led, from its perusal, to conclude; and, however warmly it admonished the country against a national debt, yet these admonitions were all uttered at a moment when a national debt had already been begun, and begun in time of peace.

Mr. W. having resumed his seat,

Mr. WRIGHT said he rose to make a very few explanations, and would detain the Senate but a few minutes.

He thought the Senator in error as to his additional six millions of means which had been expended during the term of the present Administration, arising from deferred merchants' bonds. He spoke from recollection, and would not be confident, but the only general suspension of bonds which he recollected, took place under the act of Congress of the 16th of October, 1837, passed at the extra session of that year, and that was a suspension for but nine months, and could only have operated upon bonds falling due in that year.

In reference to the Senator's remark as to the President's anticipation of a further diminution of the expenses of the Government, he preferred that the President should speak for himself. The Senator said that he assigned no other cause for the expectation than the diminution of the pension roll by death. What the President did say was:

"Causes are in operation which will, it is believed, justify a still further reduction, without injury to any important national interest. The expenses of sustaining the troops employed in Florida have been gradually and greatly reduced, through the persevering efforts of the War Department; and a reasonable hope may be entertained that the necessity for military operations in that quarter will soon cease. The removal of the Indians from within our settled borders is nearly completed. The pension list, one of the heaviest charges upon the Treasury, is rapidly diminishing by death. The most costly of our public buildings are either finished or nearly so; and we may, I think, safely promise ourselves a continued exemption from border difficulties."

His principal object in rising at this time, was to make a correction of an error into which the Senator had fallen in his first remarks, in reference to the manner of keeping the accounts of the trust funds at the Treasury Department. He had intended to make the correction before; but not having noted it on his brief, it had been forgotten. He was expressly authorized to say that separate and distinct accounts of all trust funds were kept at the Department, with all the accuracy and care which characterized the keeping of any accounts there. The books containing these accounts were regularly brought up, and the statement of any such account could be regularly and accurately made from them but the state of these accounts was not, as matter of course, communicated to Congress with the Secretary's financial report. Such communications were always made when called for, and not otherwise. The Senator would see, therefore, that his idea—that these accounts, and the moneys in the Treasury to their credit, had become intermingled with the general affairs of the Treasury, so that it was difficult to tell how the trust funds did actually stand—was a mistaken one. There was no confusion upon the subject at the Department.

After a few remarks from Mr. WEBSTER—

Mr. WRIGHT said he wished to add a single remark which he had omitted when last up. The Senator complained that the sums which were stipulated, by the Indian treaties, to be invested for the Indians, did not appear in the annual estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. He said the Indian annuities were annually estimated for, and therefore were made to appear to Congress yearly as claims which must be paid. Mr. WRIGHT thought it was a perfect answer to the suggestion to say that the interest upon the sums stipulated to be invested, and not invested, was annually estimated for, as the Senator would find by examining the estimates for the Indian Department, and this estimate showed the liability as fully as an estimate of the principal would do. The estimate is for the annual interest upon a sum named and stipulated by treaty to be invested. Is it possible to specify the liability more distinctly or plainly? Are our liabilities for the annuities more fully exhibited in the estimates? He could not see that they were.

Another single remark would content him. The Senator seemed to suppose it doubtful, from the message of the President, and the remarks of himself, whether they did not both favor a recall of the moneys on deposit with the States, rather than the impositions of duties upon "wines and silks." Of the opinion of the President upon this subject, he could say nothing, because the President had expressed no opinion; and for himself, he could say that he had neither given, nor intended to give, any opinion upon this point. He would not certainly favor a recall of the money deposited with the States, until the Treasury wanted money, and when that state of facts should be shown, and he should be asked for a vote, either to recall those moneys, or to impose a duty upon wines and silks, he should not be found unprepared, or reluctant, to make the decision.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. WRIGHT; which was agreed to.

And the Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1840.

The Hon. JOHN MOORE, member elect from the State of Louisiana, in the place of RICHARD GARLAND, resigned, was duly qualified, and took his seat.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

The SPEAKER announced the first business in order to be the bill introduced by Mr. HAND, on Thursday last, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the laws now in existence on that subject.

Mr. STANLEY called for the reading of the bill. The SPEAKER remarked that the bill was at the printer's, and, if there were no objection, it might be passed over for the present.

The SPEAKER then, in accordance with the rule, resumed the call on the States and Territories for petitions and memorials, commencing with the Territory of Iowa.

Petitions and memorials were then presented by Mr. CARR of Indiana.

Messrs. J. W. ALLEN, DUNCAN, and TAYLOR, of Ohio.

Mr. CARTER of Tennessee.

Messrs. GARLAND and GOGGIN of Virginia.

[Mr. GOGGIN of Virginia presented the petition of Dr. Wm. B. Vaughn, of Bedford county, relating to his newly invented self-moving locomotive engine, applicable to railroads, asking the aid of Congress.]

Mr. KIEM of Pennsylvania.

[Mr. KIEM of Pennsylvania presented the petition of Conrad Hertz, a soldier of the Revolution, asking an addition to his pension; referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions: seven petitions of similar tenor from nearly five hundred citizens of Berks county, Pennsylvania, praying the establishment of a mail route in said county; referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.]

Messrs. BREWSTER, CLARK, HOFFMAN, FLOYD, GATES, and MONROE, of New York.

[Mr. FLOYD presented the petition of citizens of Oneida county, for the establishment of a post route from Clinton to Rome.]

Messrs. SALTONSTALL and PARMENTER, of Massachusetts.

[Mr. PARMENTER presented petitions of Esther Carter, for Revolutionary claims; Sarah T. Pratt, for pension; Anna Swinnerton, for pension; Francis Bush and others of Chelemford, Massachusetts, in favor of a general bankrupt law; Jonathan Morse and others of Methuen, for the same object; all of which were referred to the appropriate committees.]

Mr. MILLER, of Missouri.

[Mr. MILLER, of Missouri, presented a petition signed by R. Hopkins, John P. Pool, and others, asking the establishment of a post road from Springfield, in Green county; by Robert Patterson, in said county; by Isham P. Pools and Henry F. Ormsbey, in Pulaski county; thence to the town of Caledonia, in Washington county, in said State. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.]

The SPEAKER then resumed the call on the States for reports, and there being none,

The following resolution, offered by Mr. TILLINGHAST on the 10th of December, and partially considered on yesterday, was then taken in order:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House how far, and in what manner, the act passed at the last session, entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," has been carried into execution; whether any buildings, additions to, or alterations in, buildings therein authorized or required, have been commenced; at what cost, or contracts therefor made, or orders therefor given, and the terms and conditions of such contracts and orders; what number of clerks, special agents, and other officers, agents or servants, have been and now are employed under the provisions of said act, or for aid in carrying the same into effect, and where, and from what times, and at what compensations; whether each and every of the officers who are therein required to give bond have given bond, and the sum, sureties, and time of delivery of each bond; and who, if any, have not given bond; whether, in the collection, or keeping, or transfer, or disbursement of the public revenue, or any portion thereof, since said act has been in force, any bank has been resorted to; and, if so, what bank or banks, to what extent, and in what manner, and what propositions have been made, if any, to any bank therefor; and setting forth, also, in what specific manner, whether gold or silver, or notes or certificates, or other and what evidences of deposit or credit, all or any of the revenue has been collected or actually passed from the hands of the person or persons from whom the same was due, to the hands of the officer or officers charged with the immediate collection thereof, since said act has been in force, distinguishing, as nearly as may be, how much has been so collected and paid in each specific matter or medium of payment; also, setting forth how, and in what places or offices, and under what actual and personal custody or keeping, all and any and each portion of the revenue, moneys, and assurances, or evidences of debt or obligation, have been kept during said time; and how and by what agencies and aid, and what forms and process, and on what terms, conditions, and cost of exchange or transfer, and in what specific matter, whether gold or silver, or notes or certificates, or other and what evidences, all, and any portions thereof, have been in said time disbursed and transferred?

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. BEATTY to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. TILLINGHAST demanded the yeas and nays.

The motion to lay on the table was then withdrawn.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDOLPH offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the CLERK of this House pay to John B. Ayerigg, John P. B. Maxwell, William Halsead, Charles C. Stratton, and Thomas Jones Yorke, the same compensation per diem and mileage that is allowed to members of Congress, computing the per diem from the commencement of the last session until the 16th day of July last.

After some remarks from Mr. VANDERPOEL as to whether a joint resolution was not the proper form,

Mr. TURNEY moved a reference of the resolution to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. VANDERPOEL wished the motion of reference to the Committee of Claims might prevail. He hoped that course would be taken, as in case should be compelled to vote now, he must state his reasons for voting against the resolution.

Mr. HOFFMAN hoped the resolution would be adopted forthwith. He contended that the money ought to be paid promptly; otherwise, in cases of contested election which might hereafter occur, the candidates would be afraid to proceed to the seat of Government.

Mr. RANDOLPH demanded the previous question, which was seconded, and thereby cut off the motion of reference.

The main question on the resolution was then ordered.

The question then recurring on its adoption,

Mr. VANDERPOEL demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and about to be taken, when

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to lay the resolution on the table, and on the motion demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, resulted—yeas 52, nays 127, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Carr, Catey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Cray, Cross, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hill of North Carolina, Jackson, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Leadbetter, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Medill, Newhard, Parrish, Parris, Petrikin, Reynolds, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thos. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Boardman, Bond, Botts, Breckenridge, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, William B. John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—127.

So the motion to lay on the table was negatived.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the Clerk proceeded in the call of the roll until he came to name of

Mr. WISE, who asked the House to excuse him from voting, on the ground that neither he nor the House had yet heard the evidence on which the individuals whose names appeared in the resolution had been refused their seats.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman was not in order, as the request could be received only by general consent.

Mr. WISE then gave notice that he would refuse to vote until he had heard the testimony by which the claimants to the seats were rejected.

The CLERK then proceeded in the call of the roll; after which,

Mr. LEADBETTER wished also to be excused from voting, on the ground that the appropriation of money in this matter was unconstitutional. Mr. L. however, subsequently withdrew his request.

The result of the vote was then announced, as follows—yeas 118, nays 67.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Boardman, Bond, Botts, Breckenridge, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Winthrop—118.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Cray, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Garland, Gerry, Griffin, Hand, Hill of North Carolina, Hook, Hopkins, Jackson, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Medill, Miller, Parrish, Parris, Paynter, Petrik, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Strong, Philip F. Thomas, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Waterson, and Jared W. Williams—67.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ADAMS rose to ask the consent of the House to give the use of the hall to the "National Institution for the promotion of the Arts and Sciences," formed last year in this city. The Secretary of War was its ex officio presiding officer, and he had been requested by the society to deliver an address before them on the 4th of January next. Mr. A. hoped therefore that the use of the hall would be given on the evening in question, for that purpose. He then made a motion to that effect.

Mr. PICKENS rose to object to the use of the hall being granted for any such purpose. He had embraced the present opportunity of giving his views on the subject, because he had no substantial objection to the object proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. In his opinion, the hall ought to be used for no other purpose than that for which it was designed. He even objected to the use of the hall being given for preaching, in the manner in which it had been sometimes conducted. If the privilege were given to one society, it might, on the same principle, be extended to other societies of conflicting views. Besides, if the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts should be granted in this instance, it would be establishing a precedent in which the use of the hall could be claimed by societies, the principles of which were at war with the peace and safety of the Union.

He fully concurred in the views presented by the citizens of this District on the subject, and trusted the request would not be granted.

After some remarks from Mr. STANLY,

Mr. ADAMS adverted to the fact that the use of the hall had, time after time, been granted to various societies, and hoped that in the present case the rule would not be departed from. But the gentleman from South Carolina had carried his objection still further, and wished to abolish preaching in the House. That, however, was not now the question, but if it should be brought up, Mr. A. would give his reasons why the practice of preaching ought to be continued. Mr. A. then made some humorous allusions to the "societies" of which, said he, the gentleman from South Carolina appears to have so much horror.

The question being on the motion to grant leave, Mr. PICKENS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE said he would not have said a word if the yeas and nays had not been called for. He should be glad to allow the use of the hall to any society that was decent and not dangerous to the country. Mr. W. said this was the people's House for all proper purposes, but whenever any improper society should ask for the use of it, he would be among the first to refuse it. In the present instance, he hoped the request would be complied with.

Mr. DAWSON observed that it was known he had been a uniform opposer of motions to grant the use of the hall for such purposes. If the use of the building were granted to the National Institute, every other society in the country would be entitled to the same privilege; and if they should apply, on what ground could they be refused? He was for restricting the use of the hall to the legislative business of the country. The building was erected for that and no other purpose. There were 247 members on the floor, who fully occupied it, whereas, in case the lecture should be delivered, perhaps 1,500 persons would wish to be present. He thought, therefore, in point of convenience only, the churches and other buildings in the city would be far preferable. He hoped the application would be rejected.

Mr. CRAIG did not think the House would be bound to grant the use of the hall to any society, merely because it had extended the privilege to some of a proper character.

Mr. COOPER agreed with the gentleman from Virginia that this was the House of the people; but the people, in exercising it, had decided to what purpose it was to be devoted, viz: as a hall of legislation. He therefore considered they had no authority to grant the request now made, and should vote against it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi desired to know at whose expense the lights were furnished, when the use of the hall was granted for such purposes. If the expense did not exceed a single cent, it involved the same principle as if it were a thousand dollars.

Mr. WISE thought if the Secretary of War gave light to the House by his lecture, it was no more than fair that the House should in return furnish light to him and his hearers. His maxim was, "light for light."

The question on the motion was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows—yeas 88, nays 84.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Barnard, Beatty, Bell, Boardman, Bond, Botts, Breckenridge, Briggs, Brockway, Carr, Carter, Casey, Clark, James Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Crockett, Cushing, Edward Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Deller, Duncan, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Galbraith, Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Grinnell, Hand, William S. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hook, Hunt, Jackson, James, Keim, Kemble, Kempshall, Kille, Leet, Lincoln, McClure, Marvin, Mason, Miller, Montanya, Calvary Morris, Morrow, Ogle, Parmenter, Paynter, Peck, Proffit, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Albert Smith, Truman Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Stuart, Sweney, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Lewis Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Sampson H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Calhoun, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Cray, Dana, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dickerson, Doe, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Floyd, Gates, Griffin, Habersham, Hammond, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hopkins, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Lane, Leadbetter, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Parrish, Parris, Petrik, Pickens, Reynolds, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Waterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—84.

So leave was granted.

Mr. BOTTS, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be instructed to report by what authority the sum of $1,180 50 was paid to Charles J. Ingersoll, esq. for his expenses in taking testimony, etc. in the contested election with Charles Naylor, esq. pending the last session of Congress, and out of what fund such amount was paid, as reported in document No. 7 to this House.

Mr. MEDILL moved to amend, by including the expenses in the cases of Messrs. Ayer and his colleagues from New Jersey, and also Mr. Naylor.

Mr. BOTTS accepted Mr. MEDILL's proposition.

At the suggestion of Mr. MCKAY, the resolution was further modified by substituting the Committee of Accounts for the Clerk.

After some conversation as to the details of the resolution,

Mr. BOTTS withdrew his acceptance of the modifications proposed, and adhered to the resolution as originally proposed.

Mr. MEDILL wished to have some information in relation to the witnesses who were examined on the part of Mr. NAYLOR.

Mr. NAYLOR replied that the bills in favor of his witnesses were not paid. They were passed by the Committee on Accounts, and the money tendered to him by the Clerk but believing such a payment would be illegal, it was refused.

After some further conversation of a desultory character, the amendment of Mr. MEDILL was withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the resolution of Mr. BOTTS, and it was agreed to.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. MONROE gave notice of a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases.

Mr. BREWSTER gave notice of a bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors on the Northern and Northwestern Lakes.

Mr. BARNARD moved the following resolution, which was read and laid on the table one day, under the rule, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury do make to this House a report to the following effect, viz:

1. A statement showing the aggregate revenue which accrued to the Government from customs, from lands, and under the head of what is usually denominated "miscellaneous," in the years 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, estimating for the last quarter of the latter year; and showing also the aggregate gate expenditures during the same years, estimating for the last quarter of 1840, excluding all payments on account of the redemption of Treasury notes, and also all payments on account of trust funds, except so far as such funds have failed to produce the full amount of interest or annuity actually paid on account of them. The statement to show the general balance between such revenue and expenditures for the whole period.

2. A statement showing the sources from which money has been derived to the Treasury, within the four years above mentioned, and the amount from each source, with the aggregate; estimating for amounts received or receivable in the last quarter of 1840. This statement to include the sum actually received in the Treasury after setting apart the original amount for deposit with the States under the deposit act of 1836; the amount of the fourth instalment of deposit money under that act which was finally retained in the Treasury; the amount of trust or indemnity funds (if any) received and not invested; the amount of Treasury notes which will be outstanding on the 1st of January, 1841, with the interest accrued on them; the amount received on old duty bonds, the payment of which had been postponed; the amount received on bonds for the sale of the stock of the United States in the late Bank of the United States; and the amount received from various banks which suspended in 1837. This statement to show how much, if any, of these moneys remain, or will be in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, 1841.

3. A statement (as far as the same is known, or can be readily ascertained) showing in what cases, if any, and to what extent and pecuniary amount, public works have been or will be carried on, or services rendered in behalf of the Government, under appropriations of the present year, or of past years, during the year 1840, (except under the Post Office Department,) in regard to which any special agreement or understanding whatever exists that the payment therefor should not be called for, and should not be made in the year 1840, or until after the 4th day of March, 1841.

4. A statement showing what will be the probable amount out of the new and permanent appropriations, as exhibited in the estimates of the Secretary of the 7th and 8th December instant, for the year 1841, which will remain unexpended or uncalled for at the close of the year 1841.

5. A statement showing the amounts which will be required to purchase stock, or make investments, for or in behalf of Indians or Indian tribes, pursuant to any treaty or other stipulation other than such as may have been estimated for by the Secretary in his report of the 7th December instant.

6. A statement showing more particularly than appears from his report of the 7th December instant, how much the expenses of 1841 will fall below those of 1840, on account of each of the following particulars, namely: because "the pensions have diminished by deaths;" because "fewer Indians remain to be removed;" because "several expensive public buildings have been mostly finished;" and because "hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close."

7. A statement showing the amount of claims now pending in the Department, growing out of the Florida war, or relations with Indians, or otherwise, whether such claims have been considered or passed upon or not, with the probable or proximate amount, in the aggregate, of such claims which will become a charge upon the Treasury, as nearly as the Secretary is able to ascertain or to judge thereof, with the means he has, or can readily command.

Mr. HUNT of New York offered the following:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and limiting the term of office of the President of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses deeming it necessary,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which article, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislature, to be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz:

"The President of the United States shall hold his office but for one term of four years, and shall be ineligible thereafter."

Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. MARCHAND, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing the name of Samuel Neely on the list of invalid pensioners, and that the accompanying papers be referred to said committee.

On motion of Mr. TOLAND, it was Resolved, That Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House any report or other official communication made to him since the 1st of May last by the collector of the port of Philadelphia, or any other person, in relation to the condition of the custom-house building at said port.

On motion of Mr. HENRY, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of making immediate provision for issuing land scrip to States for military bounty land warrants in all cases where warrants are outstanding for services in the late or Revolutionary war, or to make such other provision as the committee may deem most expedient.

On motion of Mr. HAMMOND, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of permitting Abbot Green and George Schnable, of Pennsylvania, to apply the money they have deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for the purpose of paying for lands which they might purchase from the United States at private entry, in payment for lands which they may hereafter purchase at public sales.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON inquired if the select committee appointed last session on the subject of a national foundry was considered as so far in existence as to be authorized to submit their report at this session.

Mr. JOHNSON made a statement of circumstances which took place at the last session, which induced him to believe the committee was continued over to the present session.

The SPEAKER answered that the committee was discharged by the adjournment of the last session, and could not now report.

Mr. JOHNSON then moved that the committee be revived; which was ordered by the House.

Mr. BOTTS moved the following:

1. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the amount of Treasury notes and drafts that have been issued and drawn since the 1st of January, 1840, with the respective dates at which such notes and drafts have been issued and drawn; together with the names of the persons to whom or in whose favor and for whose benefit such drafts have been drawn, and the service, consideration, or object for which they have been drawn.

2. Resolved, That he be directed to report at what time or times, and what amount of Treasury notes, if any, have been deposited with any of the banks, and, if any, which of such banks, and at what time; what amount, and what description of funds, if any, were received from the banks in which such deposits were made; and whether said money was left in deposit in said banks, or transferred to the Independent or Sub-Treasury as directed by law, and at what time the interest commenced on the notes thus deposited.

The SPEAKER was about to put the question on these resolutions, when it was objected to, because they should lie on the table one day for consideration.

Mr. BOTTS moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the resolutions at this time, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. They were taken, and resulted—for the suspension 80; against it, 60, as follows:

On this motion the yeas and nays were ordered; but before taking,

A motion to adjourn was made and prevailed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, DEC. 18, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, on leave, introduced a bill making appropriation for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1841.

The bill was read a first and second time, when Mr. J. moved that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS desired to know whether, in that bill, any provision had been made for the payment of navy pensioners.

Mr. JONES replied that there had not, as that subject had been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS said that as payment to the naval pensioners would have to be made on the first of January, he hoped the Committee on Naval Affairs would make a speedy report.

Mr. REED observed that since the subject had been referred to the committee, its chairman had not been present.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the committee would not wait for the chairman. There was but a short period intervening between now and the time when the money would be due. Besides, there was a special recommendation submitted to the House by the President on the subject. He trusted, therefore, that speedy action would be had, and that the faith of the nation pledged to these pensioners would not be endangered by the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs was absent from his post.

The question on the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was then taken and decided in the affirmative. So the bill was referred, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the Committee on Ways and Means were authorized to employ a clerk at the rate of $4 per day.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky gave notice that he would, at some future day, ask leave to introduce a bill to limit the compensation and emoluments of district attorneys, marshals, clerks, collectors of ports, and other officers of the United States; and to regulate the fee bill and costs to be taxed in suits in the United States courts.

Mr. EVANS, on leave, presented a petition numerously signed by citizens of Portland, Maine, on the subject of the colonial trade; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON moved that when the House adjourned, it adjourn to Monday next. Mr. J. observed that some time would be required to repair and replace the seats, which had been damaged by the fall of the chandelier. He hoped, therefore, that the motion would be concurred in.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. JOHNSON then moved that the House do adjourn; which motion was also agreed to.

And the House adjourned to Monday next.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, the bill reviving and extending the charters of the banking institutions of the District was taken up, and Mr. T. moved an amendment thereto; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. T. said this bill proposed to revive the charters of a number of banks in the District of Columbia, which charters were not then before them. He understood the charters were alike, and therefore he moved the printing of the charter of the Bank of the Metropolis only, with the various amendments thereto, for the use of the Senate.

Mr. KING could not see the necessity of printing the charter, as it had been already printed, and the Senator could see it at the Clerk's table. He hoped, therefore, the honorable Senator would withdraw his proposition.

Mr. TAPPAN said he had not been able to find the charters in any of the documents printed for the use of the Senate; but if the Senator from Alabama had a copy, and would lend it to him, he would be satisfied; for otherwise he knew not where to procure one.

The question was then taken on the printing, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill supplementary to an act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases.

Mr. KING said, that he had received a letter from an unfortunate debtor in New York in relation to the subject-matter of this bill. The laws of New York, prior to the last session of her Legislature, had recognised a distinction between resident and non-resident debtors. The resident debtors were exempted from imprisonment for debt in certain cases. The non-resident debtors were still subject to it. At the last session of the Legislature of New York, the discrimination was repealed, and both classes of debtors placed on the same footing. But the act of Congress of 1839, to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, having passed before the act passed by New York last winter, was not applicable to non-residents of that State. The provisions of the present bill would extend the benefit of the law of 1839 to that class of debtors. He trusted that no objection would be made to its passage at once.

Mr. WALL begged leave to return his thanks to his honorable friend from Alabama, for bringing this bill before the Senate at this time; and he hoped that his motion would be unanimously sustained. He fully concurred with him in the propriety, and he might add the justice and necessity of the immediate action of the Senate. He believed that there would be but one opinion among Senators upon the merits of the bill. The original bill was intended to conform the practice of the courts of the United States, in respect to the imprisonment of the body, to that of the several States in which they sit. The construction which that law had received in those courts, confined its remedial operation to the case; where a State had abolished imprisonment for debt previous to the passage of the law. This defect in the law was presented to the notice of the Senate, at the last session by his honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] who introduced the present bill. It received the sanction of the Judiciary Committee, and passed this body unanimously, and was sent to the House of Representatives early during the last session, where it remained unacted on at their adjournment. As soon as the committees of the Senate were organized at the present session, the same bill was, on the motion of the same Senator, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which, at the earliest moment practicable, reported it to the Senate, and recommended its passage. He had been induced to make these remarks in the hope that this bill might attract the attention of those elsewhere, who could prevent it from remaining among the unfinished business of the present session.

Mr. NORVELL said that, in addition to the reasons assigned by the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] in favor of the immediate passage of this supplemental bill, he would observe, that in one or two States, besides New York, certainly in one other, laws had been passed abolishing imprisonment for debt within their respective limits, subsequently to the passage of the act to which the present bill was a supplement. The citizens of those States were, therefore, by the construction of the Federal courts, excluded from the benefit of the act of Congress of 1839, conforming the laws of the United States, in reference to non-imprisonment for debt, to the laws of the several States in force at the time of its passage. His honorable friend from New Jersey [Mr. WALL] had done him the justice to ascribe to him the credit, if it were any, of first calling the attention of the Senate to the defects of the act of 1839, and of proposing the remedy which the present bill presented. He was glad that the Senator from Alabama had thus early moved the consideration of a bill so humane in its objects, and concluded by the expression of a hope that the Senate would immediately pass it and send it to the other House.

The bill was accordingly taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States to limit the tenure of the judges of the federal courts was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. TAPPAN, made the order of the day for the first Monday in January.

The bill to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and determine claims against the United States was taken up and made the special order for Monday next.

The bill granting to the State of Michigan a quantity of land to aid said State in the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Marie was taken up and made the special order for Tuesday next.

The bill to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes, being taken up,

Mr. NORVELL explained the necessity of its passage, and hoped it would be acted on without delay.

Mr. PRESTON wished a postponement of the bill until the Senator's colleague [Mr. PORTER] was in his seat, and also to enable the Senate to acquire the information requisite to act understandingly on the subject.

Mr. NORVELL said that all the information necessary was already before the Senate, and presumed that his colleague could have no objection to immediate action on the bill. If, however, he [Mr. PORTER] wished its postponement, Mr. N. would not press the matter at present.

Mr. PORTER (who had just come in) expressing a wish that the bill might be passed over, it was accordingly done.

The bill for the relief of George W. Paschall;

The bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act for her admission into the Union, to be applied to the making of a road or roads leading to said State;

The bill to establish an additional land district in State of Alabama;

The bill for the relief of James Smith of Arkansas; and

The bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians; were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then went into Executive business; and afterwards

Adjourned.

So the House refused to reconsider.

Mr. BOTTS, after some brief preliminary remarks, asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to report to this House by what authority, and at what time, and on whose application it was ordered and paid, they directed the Clerk of this House to pay the sum of $1,123 to Charles J. Ingersoll, as compensation to witnesses, &c. examined in the contested election between the said Charles J. Ingersoll and Charles Naylor.

Mr. MEDILL said he was not in his place when the report was made, being absent on a special committee. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman from Virginia would withdraw his resolution for the present to permit him to make a motion in relation to it.

Mr. BOTTS desired first to ascertain the subject intended to be embraced by the motion.

Mr. MEDILL said that in case the resolution should be withdrawn, he intended to submit a motion recommitting the report of the Clerk, and directing him to report.

"By what authority, on what vouchers, and through whom, he paid to E. Bulkley the sum of $500; to Bayre Newcombs the sum of $416; and to George Lowrey the sum of $104, for services rendered by them in taking depositions in the case of the contested election between Messrs. Ingersoll and Naylor, as reported in Document No. 7; by what authority, and on what vouchers, he sent to Mr. Naylor money to pay his witnesses in the said contest, and which that gentleman says he returned; whether the said vouchers give the names and time of attendance of the said witnesses, in whose hand writing it was filed, and what has become of the same."

Mr. M. said his reason for making the motion would be found in the report of the Clerk in relation to the contingent expenses. He was not aware that Mr. INGERSOLL was any more interested in the payment of those expenses than Mr. NAYLOR. A certain sum had been paid to the commissioner at Philadelphia, also to the door keeper, &c. Now he could not see that the commissioner was the commissioner of Mr. INGERSOLL any more than of Mr. NAYLOR, or that the expenses incurred for door keeper, &c. applied to one of these contestants any more than the other. And yet the gentleman (Mr. NAYLOR) had stated that he never touched a dollar of the money. It appeared that a specific sum of money had been sent to that gentleman for the payment of his witnesses. Now, how could the Clerk have ascertained the exact amount of money for the payment of these witnesses, unless a statement of the amount had been first forwarded to the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives. He (Mr. M.) understood that such was the fact, and that it was in the hand writing of the gentleman himself. What motive, also, had influenced that gentleman in returning a portion of the money and not the whole, he was unable to say. He hoped the report would be recommitted, as, if the House was to have a statement of the expenses, it ought to be full and complete.

Mr. NAYLOR explained that in his remarks, the other day, he was merely answering a question put to him as to whether his witnesses had been paid or not. His answer on that occasion was that they had not, but that he had offered to pay them himself, believing they had no right to receive it from the Committee on Accounts. He had never undertaken to deny that expenses had been incurred for commissioner, door keeper, &c. In relation to the accounts appearing in his hand writing, Mr. N. was understood to say that his witnesses had refused to receive their compensation from him, urging that, as they had been summoned by Congress, they had a right to be paid by Congress. Under such circumstances, he could do no less than to certify to the number of days his witnesses had been engaged. Mr. N. said that when the chairman of the Committee on Accounts had intimated to him, at the last session, that Mr. INGERSOLL'S money for the payment of witnesses had been allowed, he expressed his astonishment, and declared it to be an outrage and illegal. Inasmuch, therefore, as he had never denied that expenses had been incurred, during the investigation of the case, in which both contestants were included, he did see why he should be subjected to rebuke.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested to the gentleman from Virginia a modification of his resolution as follows:

Resolved, That all the papers in relation to money paid for witnesses, and the expense of taking testimony in the case of NAYLOR and INGERSOLL, be referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures, with directions to inquire how much money has been paid in said case, to whom, for what, and by what authority said money was paid; also, further to inquire whether there is any existing law authorizing money to be paid in said case.

Mr. BOTTS was desirous that this subject should be probed to the bottom, as it was evident there was fault somewhere. But with regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MEDILL,] he must decline it, inasmuch as the Clerk, in the report, had stated the fact that the money was paid under the authority of the Committee on Accounts. And in relation to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS,] he must also decline it, for the reason that he wished to afford to the Committee on Accounts an opportunity of defending themselves if they chose. He thought it would be unjust to discuss the matter without affording the committee such an opportunity.

The question then being on the resolution,

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend by adding the words previously suggested.

Mr. UNDERWOOD had seen the origin of difficulties like these, and four or five years ago he had predicted what had now taken place. In the cases of Graham and Newland of North Carolina, he believed the precedent was established of paying both the contestants for a seat. It was also carried out in the case of Moore and Leitcher, against which he (Mr. UNDERWOOD) had voted, as he had also done in the case of his New Jersey friends the other day. Now, in his opinion, this practice of paying the expenses in contested elections, of both the contestants, was establishing a precedent by which the ten thousand witnesses who might be examined before justices of the peace in contested elections, would have to be paid from one end of the country to the other. He was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts to refer the whole subject to a committee, but it did not go quite far enough. He thought the committee ought to be directed to inquire as to the legality of paying contestants to seats here.

Mr. JOSEPH JOHNSON would not have troubled the House with a single word on the subject, had not reference been made to the Committee on Accounts. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] had directed his eye towards him, and referred to conversation which the gentleman alleged had taken place between them previous to the adjournment of the last Congress. Mr. J. then proceeded to state that he had not the most distant recollection of ever having heard any thing from that gentleman of the character he said had taken place; all he knew in relation to the matter was from the accounts presented to the committee by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The committee, on a reference to the rule, agreed to pass the accounts without reference to party or other considerations; and the accounts of both gentlemen were passed.

In passing the resolution, he believed the committee had followed the invariable rule in such cases; and when the proper time came, they would be ready to go into the matter.

Mr. NAYLOR was perfectly sure that the conversation in question took place with a member of the Committee on Accounts, and that he had expressed his opinion in regard to the illegality of the payment to Mr. Ingersoll's witnesses; but he perhaps was in error in saying it was the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSON] to whom he had made the remarks; he believed he might have been mistaken in that respect.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. BOTTS and ANDREWS,

Mr. WISE said he was sorry that this great contest between the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania, had at last dwindled down to a mere little shabby matter of accounts. He hoped no foreign issue would be involved in the inquiry. For his part, he argued that they ought not to pay for two seats in the House, as a seat was not worth double price. The principle of paying double price was established long before the case of Graham and Newland; and if we mean to follow the example, it would have the effect of offering a bounty to contest the seats. He had risen, however, to call the attention of the House to one point, viz: what right had they to make either Mr. NAYLOR or Mr. INGERSOLL a trustee for the payment of these witnesses? Where was the authority for making those gentlemen the trustees for A, B, or C? He would like to have the inquiry go further, and require the gentlemen to go into an account with Government, and show that they had paid these witnesses; for if they had not, the parties could recover the amount from Government in any court of justice. He hoped the matter would be investigated, as, if the Committee on Accounts had paid away money wrongfully, they would be allowed an opportunity of accounting for it. He hoped this would lead to some rule or law on the subject.

Mr. JOSEPH JOHNSON begged leave to say that, as a member of the Committee on Accounts, he believed they had not paid away money either negligently or unlawfully. The payment had been made in strict conformity with the 131st rule of the House, as follows:

"The rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before this House, or either of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of two dollars; for each mile he shall travel, in going from or coming to the place of examination, the sum of ten cents each way," &c.

Mr. WISE wished to inquire if that rule authorized the payment of the money.

Mr. J. JOHNSON would inform the gentleman that he must propound the question elsewhere. The committee passed the accounts as presented, in accordance with the rule, and the receipts were now on file.

Mr. BOTTS desired to know if that rule authorized the Committee on Accounts to pay any thing without the order of the House.

Mr. J. JOHNSON, in reply, read the 97th rule of the House, viz:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Accounts to superintend and control the expenditures of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and to audit and settle all accounts which may be charged thereon, &c."

Here, said Mr. J. is the authority, and the committee will with great pleasure report on all the facts as far as they can. They have acted in conformity with the practice of the House ever since we have had a Government. Mr. J. concluded by observing that these objections were all a mere matter of smoke, without the least shadow of substance.

Mr. SMITH of Maine wished to know if this were not petition day.

Mr. CUSHING wished to say a few words.

Mr. SMITH. "O, there has been enough said; let us have the previous question."

Mr. CUSHING said he should be very brief in what he had to say.

Mr. SMITH. Well, I will allow the gentleman five minutes, if he will promise to move the previous question at the end of that time.

Mr. CUSHING promised, and proceeded to argue that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] was wrong in stating that the case of Newland and Graham was the first case of contested election where payment had been made. The first case was that of Elisha Potter, Senator from Rhode Island, in 1834. An act was passed by the Senate for the payment of the money, and it was concurred in by the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said the case of Newland and Graham was the first case where money had been taken from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CUSHING said that was a mere matter of argument; the question was, the fact of payment, and that was settled so far as precedent was concerned. As regarded the question of principle, the right of contest was the right, not of a member himself, but of his constituents. It was not right for the House to shut out his constituents. It was in that view of the matter that he voted in the case of Newland and Graham, Moore and Letcher, the Mississippi case, and also in another case at the present session. Mr. C. then moved the previous question.

Mr. BOTTS consented to modify his resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to report by what authority they authorized the Clerk of this House to pay the sum of $2160 50 to Charles J. Ingersoll and others, for taking testimony and for other expenses incurred in the contested election.

Mr. BRIGGS then withdrew his amendment.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question on the resolution ordered and decided in the affirmative. So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MEDILL then moved to recommit the report of the Clerk with the instructions previously noticed; which motion was agreed to, and the report recommitted accordingly.

STEAMBOAT DISASTERS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented five petitions, to wit: From Henrietta Hope and 56 others, ladies of Baltimore; from Emily G. Fulton and 67 others, ladies of Baltimore; from John Coates and 62 others, of Chillicothe, Ohio; from Seth Lockwood and 130 others, of New York; and from Capt. Geo. Guyther and 158 others, passengers on board the steamboat Columbia, praying Congress to act upon the bills reported to the select committee at the last session to prevent steamboat disasters.

Mr. U. said that after the bills to guard against steamboat disasters had been reported by himself during the last session, he had requested Mr. Raub and Dr. Vantyne to ascertain the number of steamboat disasters which had occurred within the last ten years, their nature, and the destruction of life and property on board; from which document it appears (as Mr. U. informed the House) that the whole number of disasters which Dr. V. had been able to obtain information concerning was 185; that the number of lives lost was 1,733; the number of wounded was 379; of these, there were killed by explosions, collisions, and fires, on the Mississippi and its tributaries, 991, and wounded 260; on sea and tide-water, deaths from the same causes 368, wounded 94; on the lakes, deaths from the same causes 85, wounded 4.

Mr. U. said that the information, as far as it went, was no doubt accurate; but it did not embrace, as the letter showed upon its face, the extent of the mischief. It was, however, an important document, and he hoped the House would print it. For himself, he felt under obligations to its author for the diligence and talent manifested in its preparation.

A select committee was raised, on the motion of Mr. U. to whom the five petitions, the letter of Dr. Vantyne, and the report and bills of the select committee at the last session on the subject of steamboat disasters, were referred, and the letter of Dr. Vantyne was ordered to be printed.

Whilst petitions were being presented—

Mr. BREWSTER, in pursuance of notice heretofore given, asked leave to introduce a bill for the improvement of certain harbors.

Objection was made to granting leave to introduce this bill.

And, on the question of leave, Mr. FILLMORE called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

It was then suggested that leave could not be given while petitions were being presented, to introduce a bill; and as there was considerable opposition to the introduction of the bill at this time—

Mr. BREWSTER withdrew his application until the States should be called for resolutions, when it would be in order to make the motion.

During the presentation of petitions, the following notices for leave to introduce bills were given, viz:

By Mr. MONTGOMERY: Of a bill to change the mode of disposing of the public lands.

By Mr. STANLY: Of a bill to provide for the payment of the fourth instalment to the States as soon as the public debt is paid, and to release the States from all obligation to return the three instalments already paid.

By Mr. THOMPSON, of Mississippi: Of a bill to revive the acts of 1837, '38, for appointing commissioners to adjust certain claims under the 14th article of the Choctaw treaty of 1830.

By Mr. CROSS, of Arkansas: Of a bill making an appropriation to complete the removal of the raft of Red river, and for other purposes.

Also, of a bill to confer upon the District Court of the United States for the State of Arkansas, Circuit Court jurisdiction in certain cases.

By Mr. BARNARD: Of a bill for a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Also, of a bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river.

By Mr. LANE: Of a bill to confirm to the State of Indiana the lands selected by said State for the continuation of that portion of the Wabash and Erie Canal that lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. MONROE, under the notice heretofore given, obtained leave to introduce a bill entitled "An act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases;" which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. M. remarked that the subject was one of much importance, and he hoped the House would take speedy action upon it for the benefit of the South.

Mr. CRABBE denied that the bill was more for the benefit of the South than the North.

Mr. MONROE said he had as much respect for the South as any body; and that he held a letter in his hand stating the fact that some of the citizens from the gentleman's district were now confined in the New York jail.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, under the notice heretofore given, obtained leave to introduce a bill to regulate the forms and modes of proceeding in the courts of the United State, to regulate the fee bills, and to limit the emoluments of certain officers; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DELLET, under notice heretofore given, obtained leave to introduce a bill to complete the improvements in the harbor of Mobile; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. WILLAMS of Connecticut, Resolved, That the papers on file, relating to the petition of Eunice Clark, praying to be allowed the arrearages of pension of which her late husband was deprived by being wrongfully stricken from the pension roll, be now referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

On motion of Mr. GRINNELL, Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency and practicability of erecting a light-house on Southeast point of Coreysfort reef, on the coast of Florida.

On motion of Mr. E. DAVIES, Resolved, That the Postmaster General hereby is required to inform this House whether Ralph Jackson is a contractor for carrying the mail in the State of Illinois; who are his sureties, or who is responsible to the Department for any failure on his part to fulfil his contract.

On motion of Mr. GATES,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the propriety of increasing the pension of widow Lydia Hoord.

On motion of Mr. TRUMAN SMITH of Connecticut,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of granting to Ebenezer Johnson a pension for services rendered by him during the war of the Revolution.

On motion of Mr. GALBRAITH,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions inquire into the expediency of extending the act of Congress of the 7th of July, 1838, entitled "An act granting half pay and pensions to certain widows," for another period of five years; and, also, into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act of 7th June, 1832, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain remaining officers and soldiers of the Revolution," so as to grant pensions to those who served at any time previous to the treaty of Fort Grenville, in August, 1795; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Maine,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the propriety of placing the name of Joseph Veazie upon the roll of Revolutionary pensioners.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT,

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Beriot Wright, a soldier in the late war with Great Britain, and that his papers on file be referred therewith.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Connecticut,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of granting to Jemima Briscoe, widow of Elisha Briscoe, an increase of the pension allowed to her by the Pension Office, for the services of her husband during the war of the Revolution, in conformity to evidence now on file in said office.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, (if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest,) all the correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain, or the officers and agents of either, or the officers and agents of this Government with the President or any of its Departments, which has not heretofore been communicated to this House, on the subject of the outrage of burning the Caroline on the Niagara frontier; and whether there is any prospect of compensation being made to the owner of said boat for the loss thereof; and also whether any communications have been made to this Government in regard to the arrest and imprisonment of — McLeod, by the authorities of the State of New York, for being concerned in said outrage; and if so, that he communicate a copy thereof to this House.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Maine,

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of placing upon the roll of invalid pensions the name of Daniel Cuore, of Portland, Me.

On motion of Mr. GRINNELL,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of entering into negotiations with the British Government, for the purpose of erecting a light-house on the Little Isaacs, and of placing such buoys on the Bahama banks, as may diminish the danger of this difficult navigation.

Mr. FILLMORE submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses deeming it necessary,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which article, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, to be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution:

"The six years' term of service prescribed in the Constitution for United States Senators, and the two years' term for which members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen, shall commence on the first day of December instead of the fourth day of March.

"Those Senators and Representatives who shall be in office when this amendment shall be adopted as a part of the Constitution, shall hold their offices respectively until the first day of December next after the fourth day of March when their offices would expire had this amendment not been made."

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,
The House then adjourned.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, the documents in relation to the claim of the Nantucket Steamboat Company, now on file, were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STURGEON presented the memorial of Henry Simpson; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion by Mr. S. the petition of John C. Reynolds, now on file, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CALHOUN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the representatives of Captain John Williams, late of North Carolina; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. C. also, on leave, introduced a bill to cede the public lands within the limits of the new States on certain conditions therein named; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE CHARTER OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. NORVELL, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend and continue in force an act for the incorporation of the city of Washington. The bill was read twice, and Mr. N. moved its reference to a select committee.

Mr. MERRICK objected to such a reference. True, a bill of a similar character had been so referred the last session of Congress, to which he had consented, because, at that late period of the session, he did not think it possible that the Committee on the District of Columbia could give it such attention as it required to mature it; but now, at the commencement of a session, he hoped this bill would be referred to the appropriate committee—that on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORVELL, after some remarks on the constitution of the present Committee on the District of Columbia, said his wish was to place the bill in the hands of a committee that would be favorable to its objects. It was his misfortune, at the last session, in reporting this bill from the select committee to which it had been referred, to have overlooked an omission of the copying clerk, which had since been made the foundation of an accusation against him and other Senators who composed that committee. He desired, therefore, the reference of this bill to a select committee, that he might have an opportunity to set himself right on that point.

Mr. MERRICK said the Senator from Michigan would have ample opportunity to set himself right, and to explain this omission in the bill of last session, whenever the bill came up for discussion before this body. He did not know how that Senator could undertake to assume that the Committee on the District of Columbia was hostile to a new charter, for there had been no evidence to justify the assumption. The committee of the last session—and the committee of this session was composed of nearly the same members—if he recollected right, were in favor of a remodification of the charter, but there was not time to enable them to obtain the necessary information on which to report a bill; and he hoped now there was to be no party organization in reference to the charter for this part of the District of Columbia. It was true that the present standing committee consisted exclusively of Whigs, which was a proof that the gentleman who appointed them had confidence in those appointed, that they would do their duty fairly and faithfully; and he knew of no reason now why there should be such a gratuitous assumption that the committee was hostile to the measure, and that therefore it should not have its appropriate reference. He would act on every question on its merits, and he would not inquire to what party the memorialists might belong.

Mr. NORVELL had no intention to prolong the discussion. In reference to the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, that he should disregard party influence, and did not look at party distinctions, he (Mr. NORVELL) was not solicitous to proclaim sentiments of that character. It was well known there were certain principles on which parties in this country were divided, and it was not for him to admit that he had no party bias: he had a decided party bias, and whenever questions were presented to him in which the distinctive party principles were involved, it would govern his action. If it had not been so—if it had not been that there were party distinctions—he and the honorable gentleman from Maryland might not have occupied their present positions. He asked for the ayes and noes on the question of reference.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped the gentleman from Michigan would be gratified, when certain facts were known, which had intervened between this and the last session: he thought it was due to that gentleman that a select committee should be appointed. It was manifestly the leading motive of the friends of the bill at the last session to extend the right of suffrage to many who had before been deprived of it: the bill was ordered to be engrossed; but, in the copying, one or two clauses had been accidentally omitted, and the omission was only discovered when it was too late to rectify the error, unless by unanimous consent, which was not obtained, as a gentleman on the other side objected. Under these circumstances he (Mr. CLAY) moved to lay the bill on the table with an intimation that at the present session it would be brought up again. But what use had been made of this? Why it had been published through this Union, that he and his friends had attempted to introduce into a bill respecting the District of Columbia, the principle of Abolition. Yes, the false and slanderous charge had been copied into every dirty party sheet, and in his State especially, it had been imputed to him—falsely and slanderously imputed to him—and not only to him, but the same accusation had been made generally against his colleague and the friends of universal suffrage who voted with him. He hoped that this bill would be committed to a special committee, not only because it was according to an established parliamentary principle that a bill should be referred to a committee, a majority of which, at least, was favorable to its principle, but that at all events he and his friends might be permitted to do themselves justice, in view of the accusations of those who had so foully slandered them.

Mr. MERRICK disclaimed any hostility to the extension of the right of suffrage; and if any accusation had been made against the gentleman from Alabama and his friend from Michigan of any intention to do any thing to affect the peculiar interests of the South, it was unjust, and without foundation; and he (Mr. MERRICK) gave the gentlemen his testimony that they were free from any just ground of imputation. He then argued against the reference to a select committee, and denied that it was the practice to refer bills to committees that were known to be favorable to their principle, on the petition of the memorialists. He was of opinion that this bill should go the usual standing committee for this District, for there were many matters to be regulated with which they, from their position, were the most likely to be acquainted; there were many matters that would enter into the consideration of this bill, which ought not to be overlooked in framing a new charter; it was very important that there should be a redistribution of the representative power among the wards of the city according to the population of the different parts of the city, and there were a great many other subjects properly appertaining to the committee of this District, and therefore he hoped the select committee would not be appointed.

Mr. PRESTON opposed the special reference, and argued that the bill ought to be referred to the standing committee for the District. He thought the question of an extension of the right of suffrage was one of great importance, and one that required the profoundest consideration. In his own State he had expressed his opinion that it was a great want of policy to restrict the right of suffrage, except as to color: in a slaveholding State, where one-half the working classes were struck out, it seemed to him to be an odious distinction among the whites, and he desired to disfranchise no one. In this principle he acquiesced—his principle he advocated, but he had yet, as a Senator, to be convinced whether his South Carolina doctrine was applicable to the District of Columbia. He would ask the people here what they desire, and look to what extent it would affect their institutions, their habits, their prejudices, and their dispositions; he preferred therefore that this matter should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SOUTHWARD also advocated the reference of the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia. On the abstract question of human rights, his opinions could not be mistaken; but they must recollect they were legislating for this District, which was without representation; and they should look a little further. They must consider who it was here that had a right to vote, and what was their residence here, what was their interest here, and how it would affect the great institutions of the South; and a hundred other questions they must ask themselves, before they decided on a measure of this importance. The Senator might get a special committee, that would arrive at a conclusion with wonderful rapidity; but he assured him that if it were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, that committee would reflect and examine, and then decide according to their best judgments respecting the interests to be affected.

Mr. HUBBARD said, it occurred to him it was unnecessary to discuss the merits of the bill which the committee appointed at the last session reported. That subject was not now before them, but it might be well for the Senate to consider what was the precise question which they had to determine. He had a perfect recollection of the whole history of this affair, and he would undertake to relate it. It was in consequence of certain resolutions and memorials presented to this House in the month of February, 1840, by the Senators from Ohio, in relation to this very matter, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia—a committee which was constituted nearly as at present—and on which, as late as the 5th of June, no report had been made; that other memorials were presented by the Senator from Michigan, and a special committee was appointed, of which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NORVELL] was the chairman. Now he [Mr. HUBBARD] as the chairman of the Committee on Claims would be glad to be relieved from the consideration of many claims, by their reference to a select committee; and he believed the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN], and the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK], assented to, if they did not recommend, the appointment of a select committee on this subject. The very reason why a bill should be kept before a standing committee which had it in its care, would induce him to desire that this bill should again go to a select committee, which had had it in its consideration. He thought it was not too much to ask for this. The select committee, of which the Senator from Michigan was the head, had had the memorial, on which this bill was based, in their care; they had made a report thereon, and he did think the subject should be kept where it was last session.

Mr. MERRICK replied.

Mr. KING had listened attentively to the remarks of the Senators, and he was surprised to find so much importance attached to the reference of this bill to either a select or a standing committee. They had heard of party and party legislation for this District, which had no political influence or power; but when he appointed the standing committee for this District it was certainly with no manifestation of party feeling, for the members of the committee were all of the political party adverse to that to which he belonged. In the appointment of that committee he never thought of party, and he believed there was not a Senator in that chamber that would believe it to be either right or proper to legislate for the District on party principles. But the members of the Select Committee who had charge of this subject at the last session, had been held up to public indignation because a mistake had been made by a clerk in copying the bill, and they had been charged with the promotion of this as a political game for a political purpose; but it was a base accusation, and it came from a base source. Every gentleman that knew him, well knew that no consideration could induce him to depart from the course he believed to be the correct one from any political consideration; and yet they had been thus arraigned for political purposes; and his friend [Mr. NORVELL] had been censured for reporting a charter which it was asserted contained provisions deleterious in themselves, in consequence of the accidental omissions which had been mentioned.

Now he cared but little whether this bill was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia or to a select committee. If he alone were to decide, he would say, let it go to the Committee on the District of Columbia—it was their business to examine and guard the interests of the District, and he had no doubt they would do the duty which they owed to their country, which they owed to themselves, and which they owed particularly to the District. He would be perfectly satisfied that the charter should be left to them; but his friends, who had been subject to censure, however, thought they owed it to themselves to have this subject again brought under their control, that they might present it in the shape which they had intended it should have originally assumed. There was another reason why there should be no delay. The charter of the city had already expired, and memorials had been presented urging its renewal, and the extension of the right of suffrage; and he hoped such a charter would be granted as would be beneficial to the District, giving its inhabitants all the rights that properly belonged to them. The great political contest of the country was over, and there was no object in attributing to Senators principles which they did not hold; and if the standing committee would take it up at an early day, and promptly act upon the bill, he hoped his friend [Mr. NORVELL] would withdraw his proposition. He hoped they should not make any thing like a party contest on a subject into which it ought not to enter.

Mr. NORVELL said, in explanation of his own course on this bill, that about five hundred citizens of this District, many of whom did not possess the right of suffrage, had petitioned Congress for the enactment of a new charter, which petitions were referred to the Committee on the District; but as several months had elapsed without those memorials being acted upon, a committee of citizens waited upon him, and requested that he would present another memorial, and move its reference to a select committee; and in pursuance of that and repeated requests subsequently, he had made the proposition which he submitted at the last session, and not because he desired to take upon himself the labor of such a committee, and of examining the subject so fully as would be necessary to enable him to prepare and perfect the measure; for he had enough to do on two other important committees of which he was a member. He repeated, he acted in pursuance of the desire of those whom the committee was appointed to represent, most of whom were divested of the right of suffrage; and in doing so, had he done any thing but justice to those citizens? He was also desirous to say that he was unwilling to allow the statement to remain uncontradicted, that he was, or ever had been, hostile to the interests of any class of citizens of the city of Washington or of the South; so far from being hostile to the District, he had taken his seat but for a very few days, the first session he sat there, before he expressed his desire to give these people a Representative, or a Delegate, similar to the Territories, on the avowed principle that it was necessary to induce the two Houses to pay proper attention to their interests. And at the same time, he seconded, to the extent of his ability, resolutions respecting the peculiar interests of the South, and going the full length with the Southern gentlemen, in regard to the disposition which they had thought proper to make of the applications to the Senate to interfere with those interests. Having been particularly acquainted for thirty years with a large portion of the people of this District, he had not supposed that now he should be charged with hostility to their interests. But what was the fact? Why, sir, in a formal and ably written communication, which had been sent to the people of the United States, in the shape of an appeal from the people of this District, an attack had been made on the select committee, of which he had the honor to be the chairman. In this document, it was alleged that this subject was not introduced into the Senate until after the municipal election in June last, and it was in consequence of the result of that election that it had been introduced. Now, was that the fact? Was it not introduced early in the session, and had it not been before the committee four months previous to the municipal election? Again, it was alleged that the omissions were intentional omissions, and that the select committee and the majority of that body had aimed a vital blow at the most serious and essential interests of this part of the country. Under these circumstances it was that he felt it to be his peculiar duty to propose the recommitment of this bill to the select committee. Senators over the way seemed to think that only one description of citizens in this city possessed any rights. Admitting the class opposed to the extension of the elective franchise to be here the majority, had the minority no rights? Were they to be treated as slaves, to have no voice in the affairs of the city, and their complaints to be disregarded? He hoped not.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped his friend from Michigan would now withdraw his motion of reference to a select committee.

Mr. NORVELL consented, and then the bill was referred to the standing Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of citizens of Georgetown, asking for an amendment of their charter so as to extend the elective franchise.

Mr. MERRICK, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill authorizing the granting letters testamentary and of administration to aliens in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

the allowance of invalid pensions to certain Cherokee warriors under the 14th article of the treaty of 1835.

Mr. KING gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Aaron Vail, deceased, late consul at L'Orient.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. NORVELL, in relation to the removal of the chandelier, was taken up, and after some remarks from Mr. N. and Mr. TAPPAN, was laid on the table.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, Dec. 22, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, viz:

1. From the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 11th of May last, communicating a statement of the officers of the navy on leave or furlough, including passed midshipmen; showing the cause of their absence, the time of its expiration, &c.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

2. From the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Pensions, containing information relative to pensioners, applying for a pension, or an increase of pension, required to be laid annually before Congress by the act of May 29, 1830.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

3. From the Clerk of the House, as follows:

HON. R. M. T. HUSTER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives U. S.:

SIR: In obedience to the further order of the House, passed December 21, 1840, "that said report be recommitteed to the Clerk, with instructions further to report by what authority, on what vouchers, and through whom, he paid to C. Bulkley the sum of $500; to Bayse Newcomb the sum of $416; and to George Lowrey the sum of $104, for services rendered by them in taking depositions in the case of the contested election between Messrs. Ingersoll and Naylor, as reported in Document No. 7; by what authority, and on what vouchers, he sent to Mr. Naylor money to pay his witnesses in the said contest, and which that gentleman says he returned; whether the said vouchers give the names and time of attendance of the said witnesses, in whose handwriting it was filed, and what has become of the same," I beg leave to report that the account presented by C. Bulkley for services as clerk, &c. amounted to $869 50. On the face of this account was an order, signed by the Chairman of Accounts, to pay $500 to said Bulkley. The account presented by Bayse Newcomb for services as commissioner, &c. amounted to $520. By a similar order written on the face of the paper, I was directed to pay $416.

The account of George Lowrey, as door-keeper, amounting to $104—not being reduced by the committee—was directed to be paid by a verbal order. In like manner the sum allowed for payment of witnesses in behalf of Mr. Naylor, amounting to $780, was also directed to be paid by a verbal order, which is the usual mode practised by the committees when accounts are clear and undisputed.

The vouchers give the names and times of attendance of the witnesses; but having no acquaintance with the handwriting in which they are drawn, I herewith communicate the original papers (Nos. 366 and 356) for the use of the House.

The various sums above mentioned, together with one other of $104, for Peter Lewis, were enclosed in separate drafts to the Hon. Charles Naylor, Philadelphia, to be paid out to the respective claimants, as will appear from the letter of the accounting clerk, herewith communicated and marked A.

In Mr. Naylor's answer to this letter, he returned $780 76, the sum allowed for witnesses, and also the draft for $104 in favor of Peter Lewis, stating that he did not feel authorized to receive and pay out the same, as will more fully appear from his letter, a copy of which is herewith communicated, and marked B.

The sum of $11 50, returned by Mr. Ingersoll, as stated in my former report, and $824 76, returned by Mr. Naylor, have been credited to the contingent fund of this House.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

HUGH A. GARLAND,
Clerk House of Reps. U. S.

Mr. FLOYD moved a reference of the report to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut objected to any such reference, and moved a reference to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

After some brief remarks from Mr. FLOYD in defence of his motion, the question of reference to the Committee on Accounts being first in order, was put, and decided in the affirmative.

Petitions were then presented by—

Mr. CROSS, of Arkansas.

Messrs. CRABB and DELLET, of Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky.

Mr. DEBERRY, of North Carolina.

Mr. RIVES, of Virginia.

Mr. DENNIS, of Maryland.

MESSRS. BREWSTER, HOFFMAN, CURTIS, VANDERPOEL, LEONARD, GRINNELL, and WAGNER, of New York.

[Mr. WAGNER presented the petition of Daniel Cady, and two hundred and fifty-two others, inhabitants of Fulton county, New York, praying for a law to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.]

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER then announced reports from committees to be in order.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of the owners of bounty land warrants granted for military services in the army of the United States in the late war between the United States and Great Britain; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a right of pre-emption to certain lots in the town of Perrysburg, in the State of Ohio; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to revive and continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of Vincent Vass, praying for bounty lands.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the payment of seven years' half pay, due on account of the death of Lieut. Jonathan Dye, an officer in the Virginia continental line, and who was killed in the battle of Brandywine; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill entitled "An act concerning navy pensions and half pay;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of James Deatley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDREWS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Starry; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAND, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John Grigsby for a pension.

On motion of STANLY,

Resolved, That the report made by the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, relating to the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina, be printed.

Mr. RIVES of Virginia moved that the report of the Committee of Elections, on the subject of the contested election case of Messrs. NAYLOR and INGERSOLL, made at the last session, be now taken up. It was not his intention to enter into a debate on the subject at that time, but his object in calling it up was that the House might fix upon some time when it would be convenient to go into the merits of the case.

Mr. CRABB objected.

Mr. RIVES said, the motion being a privileged one, he had a right to make it. He was, however, surprised at the objection of the gentleman from Alabama, inasmuch as he had stated most distinctly that he had no intention of debating the subject at that time.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped that when the subject was taken up, it would not be done until it was convenient for the parties interested to address the House on the subject. He did not know when it would be convenient for them to attend. Moreover, the sitting member was not in his seat.

Mr. RIVES said he had seen the sitting member that morning previous to his making the motion, and he presumed there would be no difficulty, so far as that member was concerned, as to fixing a time.

Mr. RIVES observed that the sitting number was now in his seat, so that the objection of the gentleman from New York no longer existed. The day for an examination of the case could therefore be now fixed, and if agreeable, he would propose that it would be the order of the day for tomorrow. But if that would not suit the sitting member, he hoped the gentleman would say what day would be convenient.

Mr. NAYLOR had no objection to any course the House might think proper to take on the subject. He was willing to leave the matter in the hands of the House.

After some further remarks from Mr. FILLMORE in favor of a postponement of the subject until after the holidays,

Mr. RIVES modified his motion so as to make the report the order of the day for the first Tuesday in January.

The motion, as modified, was then agreed to.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Resolutions then being in order,

The SPEAKER stated that the following resolution offered by Mr. RARIDEN, on Thursday last, would come up first:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the expenditure of $150,000 in each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, during the year 1841, on the Cumberland road.

Mr. P. then, in a very animated manner, foretold the direful consequences which he had alleged would ensue, in case the House should not make the appropriation. He declared that the eight States of the Northwestern Territory would unite, and in their indignation would make their way into the hall to obtain their rights, by force. He could not conceive why the people of that part of the Union should be treated so. The South got appropriations for its Dismal Swamps and every thing else; so also did the North; but as for his people, and those of the other Northwestern States, they could obtain nothing. Why, said he, are the people of the West to be thus trampled upon? Mr. P. also discoursed on the grievances of the Western people arising from other causes. He then touched upon nullification, the tariff question, etc. and concluded by giving the House a solemn warning, that in case the resolution should be rejected, the people of the Northwest would rise in their might, when their indignation would be an all-consuming blaze, without a particle of smoke, which should destroy all that was not right.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON, in the course of some very humorous remarks in reply to the member from Indiana, suggested to him that the true and only reason why the Cumberland road had not been completed, was that it had been begun at the wrong end. The right end was in Maryland, between Rockville and Fredericktown; and until the road should be commenced in that quarter, the gentleman, with all the people of the West at his heels, would never be able to obtain an appropriation. Mr. J. concluded by asking the gentleman to accept a modification of the resolution, appropriating $80,000 for that portion of the Cumberland road in the State of Maryland between Rockville and the Monocacy.

Mr. PROFFIT, after a brief rejoinder, accepted the modification.

Mr. HUBBARD was afraid the gentleman from Indiana was going the wrong way to work in order to obtain money for his State. Mr. H. said that so far as his own district was concerned, he was sure that nothing could be obtained by threats. If the gentleman and his people wanted money, let them open a trade with the Southwest, when, if they made fair bargains, there would be no objection to taking their pork and whiskey for produce. True, in his opinion, would be a far more effectual mode than bringing on a great army to enter the hall for the purpose of obtaining what they wanted by force. He would repeat, let the gentleman's constituents open a trade, and, so far as his district was concerned, he was sure they would be ready to swap with them.

The question being on the resolution as modified, Mr. HUBBARD moved to lay it on the table; on which motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered:

Mr. HUBBARD then withdrew his motion.

Mr. WISE renewed it.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, were as follows:

PURSUERS IN THE NAVY.

The bill establishing the pay and emoluments of pursers in the navy being taken up,

Mr. WILLIAMS explained the provisions of this bill. He said it was introduced at the last session, and passed the Senate, but was left with the unfinished business of the other House, and was now again introduced, with the intention to fix and determine the compensation to pursers. As now established, their compensation was forty dollars a month, together with certain privileges and perquisites, which were deemed to be extravagant. One great source of profit to pursers was on articles furnished to sailors—whose wages were scarcely sufficient to induce men to enter the service—which amounted to eight or ten dollars per man. Now as there were from one thousand to twelve hundred persons in a seventy-four, and the purser received from each person from eight to ten dollars on articles furnished, which came out of the wages of the poor sailor, this compensation was deemed extravagant, and it was the wish of Government that it should be abolished, in justice to the sailor, and a reasonable and proper compensation substituted; and with this object, this bill had been introduced. Besides this bill, there had been others of a similar character prepared during previous sessions, but this differed from them in this respect; they proposed a compensation to the purser something less than was proposed by this measure: this matter of difference, however, had been determined upon for the purpose of securing to the service the best men, by giving them a fair compensation, and as some equivalent for the loss of the perquisites of which this bill would deprive them, which amounted to the exorbitant sum of 25 per cent. on necessities, and 50 per cent. on what were called luxuries, in which were included tea and coffee and sugar. Of the rate of remuneration, he further observed that it was necessary to pay with some liberality the pursers of our navy, inasmuch as they were exposed to risks by losses on the property entrusted to them, for the security of which they were compelled to give bonds, on entering the service, to the amount of $25,000. They were bound to account critically to the Department for the property in their care, and Senators would recollect that during a single cruise, it not unfrequently happened that property of the value of half a million of dollars passed through their hands. It was important, therefore, that Government should give such compensation as would secure the services of faithful and responsible and efficient men, while at the same time something was done to relieve the sailors from the oppressive exactions to which they were subjected, which was certainly a great evil, both to the service and to the country. This present bill was intended to effect, but it would call for a greater sum than heretofore from the Treasury.

Mr. HUBBARD did not intend then to say any thing in opposition to the bill; but it proposed to fix the salaries of the pursers, and to pay them from the Treasury, thereby effecting an entire change in the system, they having been hitherto paid in part by certain perquisites. If it went into operation it would impose a very severe tax on the Treasury; and therefore, especially as the Senate was not fully attended, he hoped it would be laid on the table. Whether the salaries were, or were not right, he did not intend to discuss; but he hoped the Senate would not, during this session, undertake to pass a bill effecting such a change, and especially as it would impose so severe a tax on the Treasury, which it was so little able to bear; he, therefore, moved to lay it on the table, and they could take it up on some future day, if the Senator from Maine desired it.

Mr. WILLIAMS had no objection to a postponement, but he objected to the summary disposition of it, which the Senator from New Hampshire suggested.

Mr. HUBBARD said he would call it up again on a future day, if the Senator desired it; but on mature reflection he hoped the Senator would not make such a request.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped so too. There were some provisions in this bill—which, however, he had not been able to examine carefully—to which he had insurmountable objections; he objected to the Government becoming a merchant, and going into the market to buy articles, for the purpose of selling them out again to the sailors. He was opposed to such jobbing; and he believed much of which complaint was made could be got rid of, by compelling the pursers to exhibit their invoices and allowing them a moderate per centage of profit on the cost of the articles. He hoped the bill would be laid upon the table, and never called up again.

Mr. WILLIAMS defended the bill, and said that, under its provisions, Government could no more occupy the position of a merchant than at present; and this he illustrated by details of the prevailing practice. After a few other observations, the bill, by consent, was laid on the table for the present.

NAVY PENSIONS.

The bill to make new provisions respecting navy pensions, and making further provisions in relation to navy pensioners, being taken up,

Mr. WILLIAMS explained the necessity for the passage of this bill.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired whether he understood correctly that it was proposed to charge the naval pensions on the Treasury, and that the old fund created by deductions from seamen's wages was to cease.

Mr. WILLIAMS said the fund which had hitherto supplied the pensions of seamen was created by the sale of prizes taken by our ships of war, and that system was adopted as early as the year 1800. But in 1815 further appropriations were requisite, and an addition was made thereto; but the contributions from seamen's wages were appropriated to the defrayal of hospital charges. The pensions were extended from time to time, first from the original objects for which they were intended to the widows of officers killed in active service, or who had died of wounds received in service, and then to the widows of seamen who died under similar circumstances. These additions went on, and increased until pensions were given to the widows and children of officers and seamen dying in the service, whether wounded or not. The fund, however, was equal to the claims made upon it up to 1837; but in March of that year, Congress passed a law extending the pensions to widows back to the time of the decease of their husbands, and many went so far back as forty years; one instance he mentioned. He said in the year 1800, a sailing master, who had originally gone out as a sailor, was taken from the merchant service, and in the course of two or three weeks after, the ship into which he was taken was lost. The widow of that man has now established her claim to a pension since the last session of Congress—the law being imperative, and the Secretary of the Navy having no discretionary power—and she has taken from the Treasury ten thousand dollars for arrearages of pensions since the year 1800. And, again, there were officers in the highest command in the navy, who have had pensions for disabilities received thirty or forty years ago; there were men now commanding vessels in the navy, and receiving their full pay, who, in addition, are in the receipt of pensions of twenty dollars per month from the pension fund for total disability. All these charges have exhausted the fund, and it was necessary to make provision for the pensions due on the 1st of January.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired whether these enormous pensions were to be taken from the Treasury.

Mr. WILLIAMS said this bill was intended to cut off all pensions except for disabilities and for the widows and children of officers and men killed or dying of wounds received in the line of their duty.

Mr. CALHOUN asked what was the amount of the pension list.

Mr. WILLIAMS replied that the whole of the pensions now amounted to $120,000, but he believed by this bill it would be from $31,000 to $40,000. This bill would not repeal the old law relating to the creation of the fund, for it would be necessary, if we should have another war; but, by its provisions, pensions hereafter would not be given but for disabilities, and for five years to the widows and children under sixteen of persons killed in battle or dying of wounds received in the discharge of their duty; and it cut off all the pensions now established—such as pensions to the widows and children of men dying a natural death, though they belong to the navy. It also provides that the pensions to be given should only commence from the time the proof was completely established to the claim; and that no person employed by Government, and receiving pay for his services in such employment, should be entitled to a pension.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped this bill would not progress further at the present time. It was a bill of great importance, and required the most serious attention of the Senate; and as it was of the same class as the bill just disposed of, he moved that it be laid on the table. He was anxious to go as far as he could go to restrain improvident legislation; and on this subject there appeared to him to have been much improvident legislation. If they were to put the pensions on a new basis, and make them chargeable to the Treasury, he hoped it would be on some day set apart for the purpose, when they could come prepared to go into the discussion of the whole of these pension lists.

After a few words from Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. WRIGHT, the bill was made the special order for the first Monday in January.

PENSION TO HANNAH LEIGHTON.

The bill granting a pension to Hannah Leighton being taken up.

Mr. PIERCE stated the object of this bill, and the claims of the applicant on the bounty of the Government.

Mr. WRIGHT said this was a case which appealed rather to their sympathies than to any established principle. He awarded to the Committee on Pensions, from whom it came, his thanks, and he said they deserved the thanks of the country, for their faithfulness and attention to their duties, and therefore it gave him pain to oppose them on this occasion; but he considered this bill was establishing a precedent for the extension of the pension list that would be fearful and dangerous, and therefore he could not allow it to pass in silence.

Mr. PIERCE said this subject was discussed at some length at the last session, and it would be recollected that the applicant for this pension was the widow of the first officer who fell in the war of the Revolution; and under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the committee had recommended the granting of this pension, though differing from the usual principle—that of actual service for six months—the husband of this poor woman having fallen in the first engagement.

Mr. KING recollected the case well, and he said it had been pressed on Congress, because it was a strong case, and one that appealed to their sympathies to depart from the fixed rule of Congress; but if they departed from that rule in one case, where were they to stop? He had before felt compelled to oppose it, and should do so again, from a sense of what he conceived to be right.

Mr. CALHOUN said the statements made this day respecting the naval pensions, afforded them a striking lesson how they created new precedents. Plunder, and not pension, was the proper word to apply to many of the sums claimed as navy pensions; and in this class, if they once went beyond the rigid rule of justice, they would open the way to a similar squandering of the public money. He was of opinion that the last man that fell in the Revolution was equally meritorious with the first; and he regretted that the committee had brought forward this proposition, while he awarded to them the praise to which the faithful discharge of their duties had entitled them. He hoped that the Senate would not yield to their feelings of humanity, but adhere to a strict rule of justice; and that he might have an opportunity to record his vote, he called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PIERCE said, as this bill had been fully debated at the last session, and passed by a large majority on yeas and noes, he had hoped it would have not been deemed necessary to have called for them now. The force of the remark of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that they ought to adhere to a line of rigid justice, he did not comprehend. What had Congress done from time to time? Why, they had extended the pension law, as would be well remembered, to include the widows of such Revolutionary soldiers as were married prior to the expiration of their last term of service. In 1833 it was extended to the widows of such soldiers as married prior to 1794, and now it was known almost to every one in that chamber, that it included the cases of the widows of soldiers who had seen no service, if their names had been enrolled for six months. In his judgment, if the rule of rigid justice had been adhered to, pensions would have been given to the widows of all those who fell upon the field of battle during the Revolution, rather than to those who entered the army near the close of the war, and who had not seen more than six months' service, and who, consequently, had not been acquainted with the sufferings and the deprivations of those who participated in the conflict from the beginning. Who could say that rigid justice would not afford relief to this poor widow sooner than to those to whom it was granted under the law of 1836 and 1838? She was in indigent circumstances: the case was a strong one, and appealed to their justice, to their feelings of humanity, and he hoped the small sum proposed to be given to her by the bill would not be withheld.

Mr. CALHOUN said he considered the pension list no more than a great system of charity, and he maintained that the pension to men for six months' service was an imposition, and to assume the name of pension was a fraud on the public. It went under the name of charity, but its true name was plunder.

Mr. CRITFENDEN said he had been laboring under the impression that this bill had passed through both Houses of Congress at the last session, but he found he was mistaken. It was vain to tell him that this case was the same as every other case—it was vain to tell him that this could be tortured into a precedent which could be abused. It was a case that stood by itself—it was different morally, socially, and in every other point, as this was an application in favor of the widow of the first man that fell in the Revolution, when there was no regularly organized Government. That man, stirred by his own patriotism, without a country, he might almost say, went forward to make and create, and then to defend that country. Should he then be told that this case would not be distinguished both in the hearts and reasons of men, from the case of others under an organized Government? Such a statement would not reach his understanding, nor his feelings. He hoped this bill would be passed, and that this nation would not longer remain under the reproach of refusing a piece of bread to maintain this poor widow of a Revolutionary officer, who received his death wound under such circumstances. He, too, would call for the yeas and noes, that he might record his vote; and if there were abuses, let those that commit them take the responsibility.

Mr. CALHOUN said this happened to be the first case, and the Senator had said it was distinguished from the last. Now it would be recollected that the last case—the man killed by the last gun that was fired in the war of independence, was the gallant Col. John Laurens, who was then acting as a volunteer, and who had rendered important diplomatic services to his country while in Europe; and he believed his family was now in a helpless condition. Now he asked if the case of the last man was not as strong as the case of the first? Was not the case of the man who went gallantly through from the beginning to the end of the contest, and who bore the brunt of the battle, as good as that of the man who fell at the onset? And if they were to go over the cases between those extremes, they would find a thousand instances not much less strong, and all, it would be admitted, making a strong appeal to their feelings. But the Senator said this could not be drawn into a precedent. Did he forget the naval pensions, of which they had this day heard? If this bill were passed, at a future day others would come in, and this case would be appealed to, to show that at such a time, and by such a vote, the Senate had given a pension to the widow of an officer who fell in the Revolution, and Congress would naturally give to all who fell under similar circumstances. He was glad the yeas and noes had been called, for he wished to record his vote; the public had been plundered long enough, and he hoped the system would be brought to a termination.

Mr. WEBSTER said, as there were some Senators present who were not here last year, he would relate the circumstances of this case, but he should neither adorn nor illustrate it. All readers of our history know that on the evening of the 18th of April, 1775, the British army left Boston to proceed to Concord, where the colonial stores were collected, to seize those stores. That was the commencement of the war. On the morning of the 19th, this intelligence had been communicated to a considerable distance by the use of torches, tar barrels, and other signals, and before noon of the 19th April, Isaac Davis, an interesting young man, of between eighteen and nineteen years of age, the husband of the applicant, who was then the captain of a militia company, was on his way to protect the Colonial stores. Before the British troops could arrive at Concord, they sent forward a party to take possession of two bridges on the Concord river, which were situated three or four miles apart; and, at an early hour, this intention was known for many miles round, and Isaac Davis, with his company, were soon under arms and on their march. They arrived at Concord by a road that led to the lower of these bridges, and there, on the right and on the left, were seen other collections of the militia of Massachusetts; but there was no organization amongst them. Davis, with his company, however, kept on his course, according to his own sense of propriety; before he reached the bridge, admonitory shouts were given to the militia not to approach, and as the admonition was disregarded, the British fired and several men fell. Davis then pressed forward, and as he approached the bridge the British again fired, and he fell; but in the contest that ensued the British were driven back to Boston. His widow, after his death, was married to another person, and acquired the name of Leighton. She was now ninety years of age, was poor and penniless, and her case presented two questions for the consideration of the Senate—whether, on the one hand, the passage of this bill for the relief of this poor old woman would be a plundering of the Government—

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the Senator from Massachusetts did not intend to convey the impression that he had so characterized it.

Mr. WEBSTER did not say the Senator from South Carolina had so characterized it, but he had said that many of the pensions granted for alleged services during the late war were a plundering of the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN said there were some exceptions.

Mr. WEBSTER hoped there were many exceptions. Now what was the danger of this case becoming a precedent? Were there many such cases? Could there be another such a case? There could not be precisely such another case; and yet, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIERCE] had said, they had acknowledged the claim of the widows of men who had served but six months, and who consequently furnished a less strong case than this. He thought it a strong case; there was no case like it. He had received communications from as honorable and as high-minded men as were in Massachusetts, requesting him to interest himself in the case of this poor woman; and he hoped something would now be done for her by Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped he might be indulged in a few remarks on the subject then before the Senate; and he owed it to himself to say, however much less sensible he might appear to be to the sympathies of the human heart than other Senators who had preceded him, it was with great embarrassment and pain that he opposed a case of this kind; and were it not that he saw in it the introduction into their legislation of a principle of fearful extent, he should not be heard in opposition; but under that consciousness he had opposed it before, and he felt bound to do so again. But he begged permission to say a few words in explanation. He did not question at all the right of the present Committee on Pensions to introduce a new principle into the pension system; he had no doubt that this case had appealed to the strongest feelings of their hearts, and that they had been induced by their sympathies to present it to the Senate; but he desired to say that it was presented here on a principle new to him in the pension system. What had been the basis assumed as the basis of pensions hitherto? Length of service. Upon what principle was the law of 1818 based? If his memory served him right, it was service in the regular army, and for at least nine months. Upon what hypothesis were pensions based then? He could not say positively, for he was not in the Congress at that time, but he had always supposed on the hypothesis that the time of a man had been consumed in the service of his country, and that he had never been remunerated for that service, or that he had been paid in continental paper which was worth nothing; and at that late day, that was the manner in which it was proposed to compensate him for the early service of his life in the perils of that war. That he supposed to be the predication of the pension act of 1818. They passed on then, so far as his memory served him, without any important addition to that act until the year 1828, and then they passed a very important law pensioning a certain class of officers of the Revolution. And on what ground? Why, they had been patriotic enough to peril their lives in the service of their country. Yes; and he (Mr. WRIGHT) was acting at the time that law was passed—it was a commutation of a promise held out to them by the old Congress, which had either not been fulfilled or not equivalently fulfilled; on that he knew the action of Congress was based, or of the other branch of it, of which he was a member when the law of 1828 was passed. In 1832 again, a much more broad and comprehensive pension act was passed, but he (Mr. WRIGHT) was not then a member of Congress. But what was its peculiar characteristic? First to shorten the term of service from nine to six months, and to comprehend the militia, as well as the regular army. These, according to his recollection, were the features of that law—a term of service, sacrifices, and loss of time, which had not been compensated for, was the predication of that law. Well, then, so far, pensions were confined to persons who had performed service, and they had not then departed from that principle either in favor of widows or heirs. In 1836, another pension law was passed, and a most significant and important law it was. He was a member of this body at the time, and he felt it to be a just reproach upon himself when he said, that when that law was passed, he was not fully aware of the extent of its provisions—he then was derelict of his duty; but what was the principles of that law? It retained, to his understanding, the same predication; it extended pensions to the widows of officers and soldiers of the Revolution, who were the wives of such officers and soldiers at the time when they performed service—to widows who had themselves sustained sacrifices, and injuries produced in their families, by the taking away the head of the family into the military service of the country. So far, then, though they had gone a step beyond the individuals who had performed the service, they had retained the broad basis on which the pension system was founded. It was in 1836 that that law was passed; and in 1838 they passed another most essential measure, as they had seen in its operation on the Treasury, for he thought he was not mistaken when he said it had taken four millions of dollars from the Treasury, or had added that much to the expenses of the Government. These laws were passed when they had an overflowing Treasury, impelling them on to an overflowing expenditure. This, then, was a brief review of what he understood to be the general pension laws which had been passed; he knew, as the honorable chairman of the committee said, that particular laws had passed, but he asked if this proposed law did not contain a principle entirely new? From the fact stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, the time was nothing, at the most but twenty-four hours, but it was the service of the life of a gallant and patriotic officer. But he was not the first man that fell, for the Senator from Massachusetts told them that five or six freemen of this country fell before the weapon was aimed at the life of this officer. Could they, then, pension his widow, and not the widows of those other men? Could they make such a distinction? Yes, and the next day, and the next, the patriots of that period rushed to the battle field; and should they say that the widow of the man who fell on the first day of that contest should have a pension for her life, and that the widows of those who served in that patriotic struggle for a longer period, and then fell, should have no compensation? Could men make this distinction? Could their sympathies induce them to yield to this claim, and not yield to the others? He had spoken in admiration of the committee, and that admiration made it most reluctant duty to oppose them; but to what extent the principle might be carried, if they opened the door, he could not say; and therefore, he felt impelled to guard against unforeseen evils. Who had apprehended when the law of 1838 was passed, the millions on millions that had been taken from the Treasury in that short period? No man, he ventured to say. Who could say now, if they adopted the principle that the living widows of other gallant spirits who rushed to the battle field on the first day of the Revolution, would not claim to be pensioned for life; and not only pensioned for life, but, as in this case, for some years back.

Mr. BENTON. Nine years back.

Mr. WRIGHT continued: To what extent the principle would lead, he could not conceive. If this bill were to become a law of Congress—if this case were to prevail, who could stand up and protect his sympathies against granting similar pensions to the widows of those who fell at Lexington before the fall of this officer? It was views of this sort that impelled him a year ago, and which would impel him now, to oppose this bill, appealing as forcibly as it did, with an irresistible force, to their sympathies and their feelings of humanity.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he voted for the passage of this bill last session, and he intended to vote for it again; and while he avowed that intention, he took the opportunity to say that it was his purpose on all occasions to watch the expenditures of the Government, and to vote for no measure for which he could not vote with a strict sense of justice. It was said to be a new principle in our law to grant pensions to widows of men who had rendered service to their country; but he affirmed that it was an old national principle, and not only in our system, but in every other country he believed; certainly in all those civilized countries with which he was acquainted. Why, if an officer of our army went to the battle fields of Florida, and served but a single day, what was the consequence? Why his widow received a pension. The death of a husband, immolated in the service of his country, had in it a sufficient justification for the grant. This was the universal rule which pervaded the civilized world; and he was not certain that in this country it ought to be confined to this single case. Right or wrong, Congress had provided that the widows of Revolutionary soldiers, who were married when their husbands were in the service of the country, should be pensioned, and with strong reason; but they had gone further, and granted a pension to every lady who had married a Revolutionary soldier up to 1794. He was pretty much of the opinion with the Senator from New York in regard to that, but as it had been made, he was not disposed to quarrel with it. But how could he justify himself if he said that the widows of those who came forward to serve their country in the hour of its utmost need should not be entitled, by such meritorious service, to a pension, when the widows of those who served but six months, and those who married prior to '94, were so provided for? Could they say that those who sacrificed their all, should not be provided for, while those who came in when the danger was nearly at an end were now drawing pensions from the country; and who, perhaps, were reaping advantages in civil life by the glory which their military service gave them? Should, then, the women who were the partners of our soldiers at a time when they were called upon to sustain privation and sufferings in their country's defence, be denied assistance and compensation? If so, there would be neither justice, nor equality, nor right in the denial. Now, as to the burden on the Treasury, he could not think it would be very great. The claims went back to '83: that was fifty-seven years ago; the period of marriage in this country, he believed, was about twenty, and that would make any lady now living seventy-seven years of age, and there could not be many such. He confessed, with his principles and feelings, he could not give his vote against this old lady's claim, and he did not fear that it would be setting a bad precedent; and he could not conceive how any of his married friends could refuse to provide for this poor old widow, who had peculiar claims on them for protection.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 29, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, and Williams—29.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Post Office Department, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th instant, transmitting a list of all the curtailments in the transportation of the mail, made since the close of the first session of the present Congress, with the dates when such curtailments were made, the time when they took effect, and the amount of each.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON objected to the reading.

Mr. JAMES persisted, and, having read the petition through, sent it to the Speaker that he might decide as to whether it came under the rule relating to Abolition papers.

The SPEAKER decided that the petition was embraced by the rule.

Mr. JAMES then moved a suspension of the rule in order that the petition might be received.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON moved to lay the motion to suspend on the table.

Mr. SLADE asked for the reading of the petition, in order that he might know on what he was required to vote.

The SPEAKER said that a statement of its contents had already been made by the member from Pennsylvania; and the rule under which the petition came prohibited its reading.

The question being on the motion to lay the motion to suspend on the table,

Mr. COST JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays; but on observing that the House was not full, withdrew the call.

The motion giving rise to debate, was, under the rule, laid over.

REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ADAMS, after some explanatory remarks showing under what circumstance House bill No.

100, providing for the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports, had been lost at the last session for want of time, moved to refer it to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. PICKENS objected to the bill being taken up otherwise than in its regular order on the calendar.

Mr. WISE wished to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if that was the revenue bill introduced by him at the last session, and on which the Senate added, by way of amendment, fourteen sections imposing a new tariff.

Mr. ADAMS explained that it was; but his view in moving a reference to the Committee on Manufactures was not to have them report the whole of the bill, as amended by the Senate, but the bill as it was originally reported from the committee. So far as he was concerned, it was not his wish that a revenue bill should be reported, but a bill only for the suppression of fraud. Mr. A. then alluded to a meeting of certain merchants in New York city in relation to the tariff, with a view of showing in what manner they had taunted the House, and insinuated how members of the House were to be managed with "champagne and money." Mr. A. said, the proceedings of the meeting had been reported in one of the New York papers, and were of a character derogatory to the dignity of the House. Mr. A. asked who were these New York merchants who thus showed their estimate of the standing of the House? He believed there was not a native of New York among them, but that they were of the class of foreigners for whom the bill of last session was intended to apply. They were the particular allies of the gentleman from South Carolina, but he, Mr. A. did not like the character of such allies.

Mr. A. then submitted his motion of reference to the Committee on Manufactures.

The SPEAKER stated that the motion could be entertained only by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. STANLY moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of enabling the motion of reference to be submitted.

Mr. WISE, before he voted, wished to have a little more information on the subject. The bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts at the last session was a bill to prevent frauds on the revenue. Its object was not to disturb the tariff question or interfere with the compromise bill. It did not propose the imposition of a new tariff, but simply to enforce the laws on the existing tariff. As such, the bill passed the House, and although he considered the bill arbitrary in many of its provisions, he yet made no serious opposition to it. It went to the Senate, where, under the specious title of "a bill to prevent frauds on the revenue," a number of additional sections were added, laying on a new tariff, disturbing the compromise act, and imposing on certain articles an additional duty of from 25 to 50 per cent. That bill, with the addition of fourteen sections, had never passed the House, but was referred to a committee.

Mr. W. then vindicated the merchants of New York from the charge alluded to by Mr. ADAMS. He, too, saw the reported proceedings of the meeting of merchants in that city; but he would inform the gentleman and the House that the report was nothing but a caricature of the proceedings, published in the New York Herald. He was authorized to say that there was not a word of truth in the representations there made, and it was with deep regret that the merchants of New York had seen the "caricature" of their proceedings go forth, representing them as using such language in relation to the character and standing of the House. As one instance showing how much reliance was to be placed on the caricature report of the Herald, Mr. W. referred to it as saying that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. A.] introduced this bill at the last session when there were but four members present. The whole report was of a similar character, entirely false, and relating words which had never been uttered at that meeting. Mr. W. referred to a letter received from one of the merchants who composed the meeting, (Mr. Jeffries) explaining the matter, and said he was sure that if the gentleman from Massachusetts had seen it, he would not have made the remarks he had.

As for the merchants of New York being the "allies" of the gentleman from South Carolina, he, Mr. W. would assert that the South stood in need of no allies. On that question the South would stand alone on its own strength, and by that means they would secure more firmly the faith of the country. All they asked was that the tariff question might be left where it was in 1832; but when it should be disturbed, let the question be raised fairly, and not insidiously included in a bill by its title purporting to be only a bill for preventing frauds on the revenue. The present bill, with the additional sections of the Senate, was not the bill of last session. Moreover, he believed that the bill had died at the last session, and that in order to revive the subject again, it must be introduced de novo.

Mr. MONROE arose amidst much confusion, and expressed a desire to say a few words on the subject. After stating his fear of ever coming in contact with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] he observed that he would gladly, on all occasions, leave him alone, except when he said any thing calculated to injure the reputation of the high minded merchants of New York. Mr. M. then proceeded to describe the character of the meeting held in that city, and contended that the persons who attended it were as honorable and high minded as the gentleman himself. The report of the Herald, falsifying and caricaturing the proceedings, had excited feelings of the deepest mortification, in proof whereof he begged leave to have read by the Clerk a letter he had received on last night from Mr. Jeffries, one of the speakers of that meeting, and whose remarks had been caricatured by the Herald.

The letter of Mr. J. was accordingly read by the Clerk, denying the remarks imputed to him in the Herald, and expressing his regret that it had become necessary thus to correct the erroneous impression which had gone abroad.

Mr. CUSHING begged leave to ask whether the writer of the letter was an American citizen or a foreigner.

Mr. MONROE was inclined to the belief that the writer was not an American citizen, but a Scotchman, who, he doubted not, was one of the most respectable importing merchants in New York.

After some further debate in which Messrs. PICKENS, WISE, STANLY, ANDREWS, TILLINGHAST, and CUSHING, participated,

The question on the motion of Mr. STANLY to suspend the rules was put, and decided by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Baker, Beatty, Boardman, Bond, Breckenridge, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Burke, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Dana, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Thompson, Warren, John White, and Wise—45.

So there being two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended.

Mr. ADAMS then submitted his motion to refer to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. WISE, after some further remarks, moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question being first on the motion of Mr. ADAMS to refer to the Committee on Manufactures, Mr. MORGAN demanded the previous question, which was seconded by the House.

The main question on the motion was then ordered, and taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Boardman, Bond, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chittenden, Clark, Cranston, Cushing, E. Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Doe, Doig, Earl, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Farnance, Galbraith, Gentry, Gerry, Granger, Hammond, Hand, Wm. S. NAYS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cross, Dana, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Doan, Duncan, Eastman, Fisher, Floyd, Garland, Goggin, Hill of North Carolina, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Lowell, McClellan, McClure, McKay, Montanya, Nisbet, Pickens, Prentiss, Rayner, Reynolds, Rives, Shaw, Shepard, Strong, Sumter, Taliaferro, Jacob Thompson, Vanderpoel, Warren, Watterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Wise—60.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. WISE inquired whether it was in order to instruct the committee to strike out all after the 14th section of the bill, and move an amendment thereto.

The SPEAKER said it was not.

Mr. WISE then moved a suspension of the rule. But before any question was taken thereon,

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the select committee, appointed during the last session, on steamboat disasters, was discharged, and another on the same subject ordered to be appointed.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the communication from the Post Office Department, in respect to transportation of the mails, &c. was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

BILLS PASSED.

A bill granting a pension to Hannah Leighton; A bill to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes; and

A bill to prevent the counterfeiting any foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States, or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin; were severally read a third time and passed.

A bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians, coming up on its third reading.

Mr. PHELPS made some inquiries as to the purport of the bill, and the legality of the title of the settlers to the land in question.

Mr. SEVIER said he was sorry his friend from Vermont objected to the passage of this log cabin bill—a bill which had passed this House or the other branch of Congress almost yearly for the last thirteen years, but it so happened that it never had passed both Houses in the one year. When he had the honor of a seat in the other branch of Congress, this bill had passed without a dissenting voice, but had not been acted on in the Senate; and for several years past it had been presented in the Senate, received its favorable consideration, was passed and sent to the House, but failed in being acted on in that body. As the Senator, however, desired information, he would endeavor to afford it; though necessarily he would have to go back for a space of thirteen or fourteen years for that purpose. When Arkansas was a Territory, it was deemed expedient by those who then had the control of the Government of this nation, to lop off a large portion of the most fertile of her soil—five of her best counties were severed from her by force, to give them to the Cherokees, for the purpose of carrying out the policy of this Government in relation to the Indians. They took by violent hands the improvements of the settlers—they took private property and applied it to a public purpose, and had made no remuneration therefor, and every year since that period had these claims been presented here, and we were asked to pay back to the settlers an equivalent for the property they had been unjustly deprived of. He repeated that these outrages had been perpetrated with a view to carry out the Indian policy of the Government, and Congress had recognised their justice again and again. He said they had heard much in that chamber of the excitement respecting the Northeastern boundary, and the question of jurisdiction over the valley of the Aroostook and the pine hills of Maine: why, sir, Arkansas, by the transactions to which he alluded, had been despoiled of territory of more value than the whole State of Maine—a fertile belt of country 40 miles wide and 380 long, had been forcibly taken from her, and this to prevent difficulties with the Indians. The settlers had been plundered of their improvements, and they were called upon to make some compensation for them. Many of the settlers has resisted the villanous attempt to deprive them of their property without an equivalent, and to these had been granted 320 acres of land. Those who had quietly submitted to the Government had received nothing; and it was for their relief that this bill provided. It gave them but 160 acres of land, whereas the former class received 320; so that the naked question was, will you give to those who obeyed and submitted to your laws, the one-half of that which you gave to those who resisted them—nobly and successfully resisted them. He trusted they would pass the bill: it was but a scanty measure of justice, which had been long deferred.

Mr. PHELPS said the Senator had not answered his inquiry. He was not doubting the policy or the propriety of indemnifying the owners of property that was taken for the public use, but he wished to know what right those settlers had to the property taken for the public use.

Mr. SEVIER explained.

Mr. PHELPS was aware they were settlers within the boundary of Arkansas, but he wished to learn what title they had to the land on which their improvements were located? If they had a right to it, it was destroyed by the act of Government, and they were entitled to compensation; but if they had taken possession and introduced improvements without title, he then said they had no claim, more than a mere pre-emption right.

Mr. BENTON said, as this was a subject with which, from his long connection with this body, he had some acquaintance, and as some honorable Senators appeared not to be familiar with it, he begged leave to say a few words. He would begin at the beginning. About sixteen or eighteen years ago, when Mr. Conway was the delegate from Arkansas, though it was immaterial who the delegate might be, Congress defined the boundaries of what that State was to be, separating what was intended to constitute the State of Arkansas, from the vast wilderness that was beyond it; it was marked out with a special reference to the future size of the State, to make it correspond with other States, and also for the purpose of including the great salt springs which are now in the possession of the Cherokees of the West, and on the boundary line of the State of Arkansas. The act, then, was passed, the boundary of the Territory was defined, and under the administration of the second Mr. Adams, a treaty was made with the Cherokees, by which this act was repealed, by which an act of Congress was bowed down, and bowed down by the treaty making power! This extension of the treaty making power was an outrage on the Constitution of the country; it was an outrage on a law of Congress, and it was an outrage on the people of Arkansas. He (Mr. BENTON) was then on the Committee of Indian Affairs—he was the Chairman of that Committee—and he fought that treaty on every ground—on the ground that it was a violation of the treaty-making power—on the ground that it was undertaking to repeal an act of Congress—and on the ground that an agent of the Secretary of War was acting with the Indians in overturning the rights of the people of that country—that it was doing a thing that was new to the treaty-making power—that it was extending that power—and that it was an outrage on the settlers in Arkansas, and the doing them an essential wrong; and on one other ground, that on this subject Congress had already passed. He (Mr. BENTON) was then in the minority and in the opposition, as he might be again, and he was borne down, and the Constitution of the country was borne down, and the interests of Arkansas were borne down; that outrage on the country, as well as on the legislation of Congress, was perpetrated. He fought it long, but he was borne down; and the boundaries of Arkansas were contracted forty miles for three hundred miles in length. That outrage was perpetrated on a defenceless Territory, but it was perpetrated on an organized Government, and it was done by men who sat on the same chairs as those who made the treaty, and who were sensible of the outrage they committed on the people who were left forty miles outside the Territory. But contemporaneously with this treaty, an act was passed to give to those settlers double the usual pre-emption right, and not merely as a pre-emption, but as a compensation for the outrage committed upon them, and for what they had lost, and as an inducement to them to break up their homes and remove forty miles from the Indians, to save a war. They were then offered 320 acres of land instead of 160; and now, after a lapse of fifteen or sixteen years, were they to have but half of that which those who did the wrong assigned to them? He was for the bill as it was introduced; and he should give it his support.

After a few remarks from Mr. PRESTON, the bill was read a third time and passed.

TAX ON BANK NOTES.

Mr. BENTON brought forward his promised motion for leave to bring in a bill to tax the circulation of banks and bankers, and of all corporations, companies or individuals which issued paper currency. He said nothing was more reasonable than to require the moneyed interest which was employed in banking, and especially in that branch of banking which was dedicated to the profitable business of converting lampblack and rags into money, to contribute to the support of the Government. It was a large interest, very able, and very proper, to pay taxes, and which paid nothing. It was an interest which possessed many privileges over the rest of the community by law; which usurped many others which the laws did not grant; which, in fact, set the laws and the Government at defiance whenever it pleased; and which, in addition to all these privileges and advantages, was entirely exempt from Federal taxation. While the producing and laboring classes were all taxed; while these meritorious classes, with their small incomes, were taxed in their comforts and necessities—in their salt, iron, sugar, blankets, hats, coats and shoes, and so many other articles—the banking interest, which dealt in hundreds of millions, which manufactured and monopolized money, which put up and put down prices, and held the whole country subject to its power, and tributary to its wealth, paid nothing. This was wrong in itself, and unjust to the rest of the community. It was an error or mistake in Government which he had long intended to bring to the notice of the Senate and the country; and he judged the present conjuncture to be a proper time for doing it. Revenue is wanted. A general revision of the tariff is about to take place. An adjustment of the taxes for a long period is about to be made. This is the time to bring forward the banking interest to bear their share of the public burdens, and the more so as they are now in the fact of proving themselves to be a great burthen on the public, and the public mind is beginning to consider whether there is any way to make them amenable to law and government.

In other countries, Mr. B. said, the banking interest was subject to taxation. He knew of no country in which banking was tolerated, except our own, in which it was not taxed. In Great Britain—that country from which we borrow the banking system—the banking interest pays its fair and full proportion of the public taxes: it pays at present near four millions of dollars. It paid in 1836 the sum of $3,725,400; in 1837 it paid $3,594,300. These were the last years for which he had seen the details of the British taxation, and the amounts he had stated comprehended the bank tax upon the whole United Kingdom: upon Scotland and Ireland, as well as upon England and Wales. It was a handsome item in the budget of British taxation, and was levied on two branches of the banking business: on the circulation, and on bills of exchange. In the bill which he intended to bring forward, the circulation alone was proposed to be taxed; and, in that respect, the paper system would still remain more favored here than it was in Great Britain.

In our own country, Mr. B. said, the banking interest had formerly been taxed, and that in all its branches: in its circulation, its discounts, and its bills of exchange. This was during the late war with Great Britain; and though the banking business was then small compared to what it is now, yet the product of the tax was considerable, and well worth the gathering: it was about $500,000 per annum. At the end of the war this tax was abolished; while most of the war taxes, laid at the same time, for the same purpose, and for the same period, were continued in force: among them the tax on salt, and other necessities of life. By a perversion of every principle of righteous taxation, the tax on banks was abolished, and that on salt was continued. This has remained the case for twenty-five years, and it is time to reverse the proceeding. It is time to make the banks pay, and to let salt go free.

Mr. B. next stated the manner of levying the bank tax at present in Great Britain, which he said was done with great facility and simplicity. It was a levy of a fixed sum on the average circulation of the year, which the bank was required to give in for taxation like any other property, and the amount collected by a distress warrant if not paid. This simple and obvious method of making the levy, had been adopted in 1815, and had been followed ever since. Before that time it was effected through the instrumentality of a stamp duty; a stamp being required for each note, but with the privilege of compounding for a gross sum. In 1815 the option of compounding was dropped: a gross amount was fixed by law as the tax upon every million of the circulation; and this change in the mode of collection has operated so beneficially that, though temporary at first, it has been made permanent. The amount fixed was at the rate of £3,500 for every million. This was for the circulation only: a separate, and much heavier tax was laid upon bills of exchange, to be collected by a stamp duty without the privilege of composition.

Mr. B. here read, from a recent history of the Bank of England, a brief account of the taxation of the circulation of that institution for the last fifty years—from 1790 to the present time. It was at that time that her circulation began to be taxed, because at that time only did she begin to have a circulation which displaced the specie of the country. She then began to issue notes under ten pounds, having been first chartered with the privilege of issuing none less than one hundred pounds. It was a century—from 1694 to 1790—before she got down to £5. and afterwards to £2, and to £1, and from that time the specie basis was displaced, the currency convulsed, and the banks suspending and breaking. The Government indemnified itself, in a small degree, for the mischiefs of the pestiferous currency which it had authorized; and the extract which he was about to read was the history of the taxation on the Bank of England notes which, commencing at the small composition of £12 000 per annum, now amounts to a large proportion of the near four millions of dollars which the paper system pays annually to the British Treasury. He read:

"The Bank, till lately, has always been particularly favored in the composition which they paid for stamp duties. In 1791, they paid a composition of £12,000 per annum, in lieu of all stamps, either on bill or notes. In 1799, on an increase of the stamp duty, their composition was advanced to £20,000, and an addition of £4,000 for notes issued under £5, raised the whole to £24,000. In 1804, an addition of not less than 50 per cent. was made to the stamp duty; but, although the Bank circulation of notes under £5 had increased from one and a half to four and a half millions, the whole composition was only raised from £24,000 to £32,000. In 1808, there was a further increase of 33 per cent. to the stamp duty, at which time the composition was raised from £32,000 to £42,000.

"In both these instances, the increase was not in proportion even to the increase of duty; and no allowance whatever was made for the increase in the amount of the Bank circulation.

"It was not till the session of 1815, on a farther increase of the stamp duty, that the new principle was established, and the Bank compelled to pay a composition in some proportion to the amount of their circulation. The composition is now fixed as follows: Upon the average circulation of the preceding year, the Bank is to pay at the rate of £3,500 per million, on their aggregate circulation, without reference to the different classes and value of their notes. The establishment of this principle, it is calculated, caused a saving to the public, in the years 1815 and 1816, of £70,000. By the neglect of this principle, which ought to have been adopted in 1799, Mr. Ricardo estimated the public to have been losers, and the Bank consequently gainers, of no less a sum than half a million."

Mr. B. remarked briefly upon the equity of this tax, the simplicity of its levy since 1815, and its large product. He deemed it the proper model to be followed in the United States, unless we should go on the principle of copying all that was evil, and rejecting all that was good in the British paper system. We borrowed the banking system from the English, with all its foreign vices, and then added others of our own to it. England has suppressed the pestilence of notes under £5 (near $25); we retain small notes down to a dollar, and thence to the fractional parts of a dollar. She has taxed all notes; and those under £5 she taxed highest while she had them; we, on the contrary, tax none. The additional tax of £4,000 on the notes under £5 rested on the fair principle of taxing highest that which was most profitable to the owner, and most injurious to the country. The small notes fell within that category, and therefore paid highest.

Having thus shown that bank circulation was now taxed in Great Britain, and had been for fifty years, he proceeded to show that it had also been taxed in the United States. This was in the year 1813. In the month of August of that year, a stamp act was passed, applicable to banks and to bankers, and taxing them in the three great branches of their business, to wit: the circulation, the discounts, and the bills of exchange. On the circulation, the tax commenced at one cent on a one dollar note, and rose gradually to fifty dollars on notes exceeding one thousand dollars, with the privilege of compounding for a gross sum in lieu of the duty. On the discounts, the tax began at five cents on notes discounted for one hundred dollars, and rose gradually to five dollars on notes of eight thousand dollars and upwards. On bills of exchange, it began at five cents on bills of fifty dollars, and rose to five dollars on those of eight thousand dollars and upwards.

Such was the tax, continued Mr. B. which the moneyed interest, employed in banking, was required to pay in 1813, and which it continued to pay until 1817. In that year the banks were released from taxation, while taxes were continued upon all the comforts and necessities of life. Taxes are now continued upon articles of prime necessity—upon salt even—and the question will now go before the Senate and country, whether the banking interest, which has now grown so rich and powerful—which monopolizes the money of the country—bears the Government—makes distress or prosperity when it pleases—the question is now come whether this interest shall continue to be exempt from tax, while every thing else has to pay.

Mr. B. said he did not know how the banking interest of the present day would relish a proposition to make them contribute to the support of the Government. He did not know how they would take it; but he did know how a banker of the old school—one who paid on sight, according to his promise, and never broke a promise to the holder of his notes—he did know how such a banker viewed the act of 1813; and he would exhibit his behaviour to the Senate; he spoke of the late STEPHEN GIRARD of Philadelphia; and he would let him speak for himself by reading some passages from a petition which he presented to Congress the year after the tax on bank notes was laid.

Mr. B. read:

"That your memorialist has established a bank in the city of Philadelphia, upon the foundation of his own individual fortune and credit, and for his own exclusive emolument, and that he is willing most cheerfully to contribute, in common with his fellow-citizens throughout the United States, a full proportion of the taxes which have been imposed for the support of the National Government, according to the profits of his occupation and the value of his estate; but a construction has been given to the acts of Congress laying duties on notes of banks, &c. from which great difficulties have occurred, and great inequalities daily produced to the disadvantage of his bank, that were not, it is confidently believed, within the contemplation of the Legislature."

"That it has been officially declared, however, that the second section of the act of Congress does not authorize a composition with an individual banker, because it speaks only of banks and companies, (not of banker and bankers,) and because it speaks only of dividends (not of profits) made to the stockholders, and that hence an individual banker, acting upon a capital of one million of dollars, and issuing bank notes to the amount of one million of dollars, is subjected to the prompt payment of a duty amounting to ten thousand dollars, while an incorporated bank, or even a company of two or three bankers, acting upon the same amount of capital, and issuing the same amount of bank notes, will only be liable, periodically, to the payment of a duty amounting to one thousand five hundred dollars, upon the customary annual dividend of ten per cent."

"And your memorialist having submitted these considerations to the wisdom of Congress, respectfully prays, that the act of Congress may be so amended as to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a composition for the stamp duty, in the case of private bankers, as well as in the case of corporations and companies, or so as to render the duty equal in its operations upon every denomination of bankers."

Mr. B. had read these passages from Mr. Girard's petition to Congress in 1814, first, for the purpose of showing the readiness with which a banker of the old school paid the taxes which the Government imposed upon his business; and, next, to show the very considerable amount of that tax which on the circulation alone amounted to ten thousand dollars on the million. All this, with the additional tax on the discounts, and on the bills of exchange, Mr. Girard was entirely willing to pay, provided all paid alike. All he asked was equality of taxation, and that he might have the benefit of the same composition which was allowed to incorporated banks. This was a reasonable request, and was immediately granted by Congress.

Mr. B. having vindicated his bill on British and American precedent, as well on reason and principle, went on to state its details, and to show the probable amount of the tax it would produce. He stated that he proposed a tax of one per centum per annum on the notes of twenty dollars and upwards; of two per cent. on the notes of five dollars, and under twenty; and four per cent. on the notes under five dollars. This he held to be a more moderate tax than that imposed upon the banking interest by the act of 1813, for while it taxed the circulation a little higher than was done by that act, yet it taxed nothing but the circulation. The discounts and the bills of exchange were not included. He justified the higher tax placed on the small bills for the same reason which occasioned them to be more highly taxed in Great Britain when notes under £5 were tolerated there, to wit: because those small notes were more profitable to the makers than the large ones, and therefore could afford to pay higher, and were more injurious to the country, and therefore ought to pay higher.

To collect this tax, Mr. B. said that his bill followed the plan that had prevailed in England since the year 1815, that is, to require the banks, and other corporations, and the individuals and companies which issued paper money, to give in to the clerk of the United States district court the average of the circulation for the first three quarters of the year, and an estimate of the fourth quarter; upon which the marshal of the district should make the collection, under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury. He held this to be a cheap, efficient, and simple method of collecting the tax. It avoided all the objections which applied to a stamp duty; objections so great that, both in England and America, while the stamp duty was nominally imposed, a composition so moderate was permitted that the duty was always compounded for a gross sum.

The product of the tax was the point to which Mr. B. next adverted. He said the product would be considerable, and well worth the collection. On the present circulation of about one hundred millions, of which more than half might be assumed to be under twenty dollars, and therefore paying the higher tax, the product would not be less than a million and a half of dollars. But the paper system is now in a state of depression: it has been vastly contracted within a year past to make "distress" for the election of 1840, and will soon swell out again to make plunder for speculators. In 1837, the circulation was one hundred and forty millions; it will doubtless expand to that amount again in the course of the year; it is time for the new expansion to begin; and when the Constitutional Treasury is abolished, and all check over the issue of bank paper removed, the circulation will probably amount to two hundred millions of dollars. The product of the bank tax would then be about three millions of dollars; a respectable sum in itself, very nearly equal to the sales of the public lands, and sufficient to admit the suppression of taxes on many articles of comfort and necessity.

Having made this exposition of his bill as a revenue measure—as a measure purely and simply intended to raise revenue from the moneyed interest employed in banking, Mr. B. said there was an additional feature in the bill which he had not yet mentioned, and which he should now proceed to develop. It was in an annual progressive increase of the tax on small notes—those under the size of twenty dollars—which he had inserted in the bill; and the motive for which increase he would now state. The bill, as already explained to the Senate, proposes a higher tax on the small notes than on the large ones. This was done on the fair revenue principle before stated, and which was acted upon in England when the circulation of small notes was admitted there. But in addition to this higher tax on such notes, an annual increase is proposed to be added to it until the whole tax amounts to twelve per cent. per annum. This increase was not intended solely for revenue, but partly to effect the gradual suppression of these notes. This was the motive for the increase; and the bill was so drawn as to present this additional tax as a separate clause, and as claiming from the Senate a distinct and separate consideration. The provision was, that notes of five dollars and under twenty, should pay one per centum per annum additional tax, and those under five dollars should pay two per centum per annum additional, until the tax on each amounted to twelve per cent. This additional tax, annually increasing, would gradually bear down these notes, and put an end to their circulation at the end of some years, in the mean time supplying revenue. This was the character and object of the second part of the bill; and as it was the first time that a measure of this kind had been brought before the Senate, he felt it to be incumbent upon him to vindicate his proposition, and to anticipate and obviate some of the objections which might be made to it. At the head of these objections stood the question of constitutionality—a question which should be well considered at the proposal of every new measure. It might be objected that the taxing power could not be used for an incidental purpose; that it must be confined to its direct object. Before answering this objection, Mr. B. would say that there were five classes of politicians in the United States, and very numerous classes too, who could not use it—who were precluded by their principles from using it. These were, first, all those who admitted the right of Congress to regulate the currency generally; for as there was no specified mode of regulating it, it resulted of course that Congress should use any one of its actual powers for that purpose which would accomplish the object. Secondly, all those who held it constitutional to charter a National Bank to regulate the currency; for it was clear that if Congress, in the exercise of an implied power, could invest a company of individuals with the power of regulating the currency, it might regulate the same currency itself by the exercise of an express power. Thirdly, all those who deemed it constitutional to lay duties for the direct purpose of protection; for if it was constitutional to banish foreign products in that way, it was still more clearly so to use the same power for the suppression of a domestic nuisance. Fourthly, all those who held it constitutional to lay duties with a view to incidental protection; for if an incidental object can be allowed in one case, it may in another. Fifthly, all those who held it constitutional to lay prohibitory duties; for prohibition was the same, whether it applied to one object, or another. Mr. B. said, these five classes of politicians were precluded from making the question of constitutionality to the second part of his bill; and he believed these five classes would comprehend nearly the whole of the politicians in the Union; he believed that almost every politician would fall into one or the other of these classes, and not few would fall into the whole of them; all such he held to be precluded by their principles from objecting to his proposed measure. But there may be others, he said, not included in these classes, and therefore not estopped by their established principles; and to whom a reply upon the merits is due. That reply is as brief as it is obvious, namely, that where the Constitution requires a thing to be done, and has not specified the mode of doing it, Congress may exercise any one of its granted powers for the purpose which is adequate to the object. This is the principle, and now for its application: The Constitution requires the gold and silver currency to be preserved; the small notes destroy that currency, and substitute for it a base paper money. The Constitution requires gold and silver to be the only legal tender in payment of debts; the small notes destroy that tender, and make base paper a forced tender in payment of every debt. Here, then, are two infractions of the Constitution operated by these small notes; here are two constitutional requisitions defeated by these small notes; here is a two-fold duty devolved upon the Congress—first, to prevent these infractions, and second, to comply with these requisitions; and no way is pointed out for doing it. The obvious course then is, to use any remedy that a granted power will afford for the purpose. The taxing power will do this. It will kill the small notes, which are killing the Constitution; and it is absurd to think of waiting for an express power to put down these destroyers of the Constitution; for the framers of that instrument never foresaw the evil; they never foresaw the existence of a thousand banks, and ten thousand individuals, all issuing small paper money, and refusing to pay it when they pleased; and a great political party sustaining them in their conduct. These are things not foreseen by the framers of the Constitution; they are evils against which specific remedies cannot be directed; they are evils which must continue unless a remedy can be found in the incidental exercise of a granted power; and to deny this, is to say that the Constitution cannot be used to save itself.

Mr. B. said that neither the idea of his bill, nor the argument in favor of it, was original with him. They had both been used by others long since, and especially by Mr. Gallatin ten years ago. Mr. Gallatin, in his essay on currency, in the year 1830, had proposed this method of putting down small notes; and in an elaborate argument, had vindicated its constitutionality, clearly showing that it avoided the Hamiltonian, and came within the Jeffersonian construction of the Constitution. His argument is too extended to be quoted in full here; but some passages from it will show his opinion, and exhibit a part of his reasoning. He says:

"We have already adverted to the provisions of the Constitution, which declare that no State shall either coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver coins a tender in payment of debts, or pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, and which vest in Congress the exclusive power to coin money, and to regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin. It was obviously the object of the Union to consolidate the United States into one nation, so far as regarded all their relations with foreign countries, and that the internal powers of the General Government should be applied only to objects necessary for that purpose, or to those few which were deemed essential to the prosperity of the country, and to the general convenience of the people of the several States. Amongst the objects thus selected, were the power to regulate commerce among the several States, and the control over the monetary system of the country."

"Congress has the power to lay stamp duties on notes, on bank notes, and on any description of bank notes. That power has already been exercised; and the duties may be laid to such an amount, and in such a manner, as may be necessary to effect the object intended. This object is not merely to provide generally for the general welfare, but to carry into effect, in conformity with the last paragraph of the eighth section of the first article, those several and express provisions of the Constitution which vest in Congress exclusively the control over the monetary system of the United States, and more particularly those which imply the necessity of a uniform currency. The exercise of the power for that object is free of any constitutional objection, provided the duties thus laid shall be uniform, and applied to the Bank of the United States, as well as to the State banks. The act of laying and collecting the duties, which is expressly granted, is alone sufficient to effect the object. As no appropriation of money is wanted for that purpose, the exercise of power which is required, is purely that of laying duties; and it is not liable to the objection, that to assert that the authority to lay taxes implies that of appropriating the proceeds is a forced construction. It is equally free of any objection derived from any presumed meaning of the words "general welfare," since the power to lay duties will, in this instance, be exercised, in order to carry into effect several express provisions of the Constitution, having the same object in view. Congress may, if it deems proper, lay a stamp duty on small notes, which will put an end to their circulation. It may lay such a duty on all bank notes, as would convert all the banks into banks of discount and deposit only, annihilate the paper currency, and render a Bank of the United States unnecessary in reference to that object. But if this last measure should be deemed pernicious, or prove impracticable, Congress must resort to other and milder means of regulating the currency of the country. The Bank of the United States, as has already been shown, was established for that express purpose."

Mr. B. would not go further into the constitutional question, as it concerned the second part of his bill, at present. He held what had been said by himself, and quoted from Mr. Gallatin, to be sufficient on that head; sufficient, at all events, to warrant the introduction of his bill. The other part of it—that which related to revenue—was free from all constitutional question, and presented nothing but a question of expediency. It presented the simple question whether the moneyed interest employed in banking ought to be made to contribute to the support of the Government; and to that question he expected a general answer in the affirmative. To the expediency of suppressing the small notes under twenty dollars, he should also expect an affirmative answer from the majority of the Senate and the people. He himself should be for suppressing all under one hundred dollars; but the public mind was not yet ripe for so strong a measure. The small notes under twenty dollars were the great evil at present. They were a pestilence, a nuisance, and a curse to the country. They drove specie out of the country, and made safe banking impossible. They threw the losses, when banks stopped payment, upon those who had no benefit from banks when they were going on: they threw all the losses upon the laboring and small dealing part of the community. They promoted crime and immorality; for the counterfeiting, and passing counterfeit paper, fell almost entirely upon the small notes. They banished silver; for how could a silver dollar circulate against a one dollar note? They banished gold; for how could an eagle circulate against a ten dollar, or a half eagle against a five dollar bill? They were injurious to every interest, except the banking interest, and to them they were the source of enormous, but most undue profit.

Mr. B. submitted his bill, with the declaration that it was one of the measures for the protection of the constitutional currency, and the restriction of the paper system, which went to the foundation of parties; that it concerned the great question of the age—that of the currency—on which Jefferson and Hamilton divided fifty years ago, and on which Democracy and Federalism must continue to divide until the question of mastery and permanent supremacy was decided between the banks and the people.

At the request of Mr. PRESTON, the bill was then read.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said it was not usual, nor in accordance with the courtesy generally extended to Senators, on asking leave to introduce a bill, to make objections; but this bill was of such a character, that, with the views he entertained, it seemed to him it was not properly admissible. There was a provision in the Constitution which provided that all bills for the raising of revenue should originate in the House of Representatives, though the Senate might make amendments thereto. Now what was this bill? It was a bill by which it was intended to lay a tax upon all bank notes issued by any banking incorporation in this country. It was not confined to any district or territory, but it was a bill to lay a tax, in the form of a duty, to be assessed and paid into the Treasury of the United States, and thus forming a part of the receipts and the money of the Government, and to be expended as such. Now if he understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] aright, that Senator considered it a part of their obligations to compel these corporations to pay a portion of that which justly goes into the Treasury in the shape of revenue; and if so, it was not within the powers conferred upon them by the Constitution; and could they, then, permit the introduction of a bill containing such a provision? He had no intention to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri on the merits of the bill; with the views he entertained he did not consider the Senate could constitutionally receive the bill, and therefore he should attempt no reply. Some years ago it was a question there whether, indeed, the Senate could reduce a rate of duty proposed to be imposed by a bill which had come up from the other House; but on that subject he had now nothing to say, nor should he say a word on the merits of this bill; he merely felt it to be his duty to state the views he had on the question of its reception, and therefore, on the question of granting leave, he called for the ayes and noes.

Mr. BENTON said the objection of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HUNTINGTON] was a very fair one; it was one which he had anticipated, for he should have sat there for twenty years to very little purpose, if he had not foreseen it. He repeated, it was a fair objection, and it was entitled to the grave consideration of the Senate. But in the twenty years that he had sat there, he had seen the thing done, and that in a piece of legislation which they deemed the most sacred of all the legislation they had ever done; he alluded to the compromise act of 1833, which originated in the Senate, and to that part in which they raised the duty on coarse woollens from five to fifty per cent. That bill was entertained by this body, it was carried through this body, and was perfected by this body.

Mr. WEBSTER. No, no, no; not perfected.

Mr. BENTON repeated that it was perfected by this body. He knew well what he said. It was perfected by this body; it was discussed and amended in this body; afterward adopted as an amendment in the House of Representatives, and then was sent up again to this house, and passed as a House bill. That bill, after being entertained by this body, and perfected by this body, or discussed until they were satisfied with it, was taken as an amendment by the other House, passed there, and sent here, and then passed here. Thus it began here—was discussed here—amended here—perfected here—but not passed till adopted and sent up by the House.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama would suggest the propriety of raising no question of this kind on the bill until it was printed; the discussion could come up more properly when the bill was about to have its second reading, or on the question whether it should be read a second time.

Independently of the question raised by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, he believed there was another grave constitutional question to be determined, namely: whether they had the power to regulate State bank institutions at all. If they could raise a tax to the amount proposed, they could lay a tax to any other amount—to an amount that would be a total prohibition of a system of banking which they had had from the foundation of this Government. Let the bill be printed, and then let the question come up when they were acquainted with its provisions.

Mr. WEBSTER asked what could be a clearer case than this? The very head and title of the bill showed that it was intended thereby to lay a tax, and the Constitution said that all such bills should originate in the House of Representatives. The case of the compromise act was different; the general scope of that act was not to raise, but to reduce taxes; but even then it was thought that it had a very doubtful right there. But he was surprised to hear any gentleman asking leave to introduce such a bill as this.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to lay the question of reception on the table, and that the bill be printed. He hoped no question would be taken on the bill until they had had an opportunity to read it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON hoped the gentleman would withdraw his motion for a moment. He was about to remark that the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY] that they should let this bill take the usual course, and that the objections should be considered at another stage, seemed to him to be one that ought not to be indulged in by the Senate. The provisions of the Constitution were directly opposed to the Senate's right to entertain this bill at all, and he thought the Senate ought to meet it at once. Why, then, a motion for postponement? Had not every body heard the bill read? And were they not satisfied that in its very terms it proposed to lay a tax which should be paid, as a part of the revenue, into the Treasury? If this were so, he thought the motion ought to be disposed of; that the question ought to be settled; and he thought the Senate was as ready now as it would be at any other time, even if the bill were printed. They knew what it contained, and if they had not the right to entertain this bill, which in its letter and spirit was a bill to raise revenue, he would like to know why it was there for a moment? It could not properly be there; and therefore he hoped the question would be taken, and that the yeas and noes would be ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN said it was undoubtedly true the Senate could not originate a bill to raise a revenue by taxation; and at another period, on another measure, when he presided over the Senate, the question was raised, whether, as they had not the power to originate bills to raise revenue, they could reduce taxation; he overruled the objection and the Senate confirmed his decision, and the compromise bill was passed under that decision. But in its progress, as an amendment was made in favor of coarse woollens, and as the question had arisen as to the right of the Senate, the other House adopted the amendment as its own, to obviate any informality. He argued that the question should be decided by the Chair, whether this bill was admissible.

Mr. KING did not agree with the Senator from South Carolina, that this question called for the decision of the Chair. It was for the Senate to decide whether this proposition should be entertained; and there could be no agency in the matter until the Senate had decided whether the bill should be received. He would take that occasion to say that he was not prepared to receive it because it was in direct contradiction to the provisions of the Constitution. He would say, further, that if it came from the other House, it would find but little favor with him; but it was then sufficient for him to say, that it was in direct conflict with the Constitution; and the Senate, knowing what its provisions were, should now come to a decision.

Mr. CALHOUN said, the motion was to receive this bill. He conceived it was the duty of the Chair, if the bill was in conflict with the Constitution, to say so.

Mr. PIERCE had not had the fortune to hear the bill read at length, but he supposed the idea of rejecting the proposition to receive a bill was somewhat extraordinary. He did not, at present, understand its provisions; and, therefore he was gratified with the motion of his colleague, [Mr. HUBBARD] which would settle no principle in regard to it, he motioned merely going to the extent of laying it on the table, that they might have it printed, to give to those of them who had not heard the bill read at length an opportunity to read it. After what he had heard, he concurred with the opinions expressed, but he preferred reading the bill for himself. As no principle was involved, he hoped the simple motion of reception and printing would be adopted, and with that intention he would make the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER hoped the ayes and noes would be taken thereon.

The PRESIDENT stated the question before the Senate, and

Mr. SEVIER rose to make an appeal to the other side of the house: he thought the course pursued on the other side was a strange one, and therefore he hoped for their indulgence to allow the bill to be printed. What did they propose to gain by the course they were taking? Doubtless their object was to defeat the bill, if it were introduced at all, and why not then introduce it and defeat it on its merits.

Mr. WEBSTER wished to say that his object was not to defeat the bill—he hoped, himself, to consider it; but he did not permit himself to entertain an opinion on its merits when it was a constitutional question that was before them.

As to the question of printing, he thought it was at present sufficient that they had heard the bill read; the bill was entitled a bill for the laying a tax on the issues of banks, and it proceeded to lay that tax; but if Senators were not satisfied, they could have it read again, but he wished the Senate to give not the slightest degree of countenance to a measure which the Constitution expressly prohibited. Now, the motion to lay the bill on the table, implied a doubt whether it was not rightly there; he had no doubt it was wrongly there altogether, and they ought not to take the slightest incipient step on such a bill. It had been read, and it was clearly for the laying of a tax; and it was clear that such a bill was not within their constitutional power.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said no principle whatever was involved in the motion of his friend from New Hampshire—they neither voted on the adoption nor the rejection of the bill. He hoped the Senate would adopt the motion, allow the bill to be printed, and that they would have another opportunity to vote on its merits. Not doubting that the Senate would give them that opportunity, he would now renew his motion to lay the motion of the Senator from Missouri on the table, and that the bill be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER hoped the question would be determined by the ayes and noes, which were ordered.

After a few words from Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. CLAY of Alabama, and Mr. WEBSTER, the vote was taken on the motion to lay it on the table, and it was determined in the negative—ayes 18, noes 22, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Ben on, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Norvell, Pierce, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Rugles, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and Webster—22.

Mr. BENTON then said he had accomplished the main, though not the whole of his objects in introducing the bill. One object was to bring the question before the country—that he had accomplished, and therefore he would now withdraw his motion for leave to introduce the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER said the Senator could not withdraw it without the consent of the Senate.

On this question a point of order arose, which led to an animated debate, in which Messrs. WEBSTER, TAPPAN, CLAY of Alabama, PIERCE, CALHOUN, KING, CRITTENDEN, HUNTINGTON, PRESTON, SEVIER, MERRICK, PHELPS, and others took part, a report of which will be given hereafter.

It was then resolved, on the motion of Mr. PRESTON, that when the Senate adjourn, it do adjourn to meet again on Monday next.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 24, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

1. From the President of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 17th inst. asking "what appropriations of money at the last session of Congress were expended by him; designating to what particular objects such appropriations were made, and the specified sums suspended; and what sums continued to be so suspended at the commencement of the present session, and their objects respectively."

The bill for the relief of James Smith of Arkansas.

The bill for the relief of George W. Parrhall.

The bill for the relief of William Jones.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The next business in order was the motion or REYNOLDS of Illinois to refer a memorial from the Legislature of that State to the Committee on Public Lands, with the following instructions:

"To report a bill to grant prospective pre-emptions to settlers on the public lands, and to reduce the price to settlers according to the value of said lands."

Mr. REYNOLDS advocated his motion at some length, and dwelt upon the injustice done to the new States by the present land system.

His remarks will appear hereafter.

Mr. PICKENS retorted exceedingly that his friend from Illinois had thought proper, at this time, to bring forward such a subject. We were now at the commencement of a short session, with many other matters pressing upon us, and, in his opinion it was not the proper period for agitating a subject of the most vital interest to the Union. From what he had heard from the gentleman from Indiana the other day, and from what had been manifested from other quarters of the House, he was convinced that no question in future that might be brought up before Congress would be more agitating, or of a greater interest than the disposition of these public lands. For his part, when he came to legislate on this subject, he would, as he did on all other subjects: he would legislate neither for the inhabitants of log cabins, nor for the occupants of palaces; but he would legislate for the justice and honor of his country. This, however, was not the proper time for legislating on so important a subject, and he could not but regret its introduction at this period of a short session. The proper time would be at the next Congress, which would bring a new set of Representatives.

The question on the adjustment of the tariff would be also then brought up, when there would be time to mature some measure which should do justice to both the individuals, as well as to all States. He confessed that, in prospect of the next census, he considered the question of the public lands a very different question from what it was twenty years ago, when they had to legislate but for a few States, and for a small band of citizens, who had gone forth to seek a living in the wilderness, and to erect their habitations in the forests of the West. The subject of the Western lands was to this Government our colonial system, and his desire was, when the subject should come up, to place these people in a different situation than that in which they had been for the last ten years, and to set free our colonies. He wanted some fixed principle in relation to these lands, not as a money or tariff question, but as a question of politics. He was interested in the prosperity and freedom of the West, and if we ever had another pre-emption bill, he would prefer that it should be one fixing the law in advance. A general prospective pre-emption law, would be far more preferable than one extending only to two or three years. The latter, in his opinion, was unjust and unwise legislation. This was the reason why he had opposed pre-emption and graduation laws previously introduced, because they were made after the case had occurred, and no system could be wise which was thus exposed to the operation of so much partiality. He would propose that this subject should come up at the next Congress, when they might fix on some system that would do credit to the Government as well as to the citizens concerned. He would not say what he might be forced to do, but if the prediction of the gentleman of Indiana [Mr. PROFFER] should be verified, and the people of the West came to demand what they called justice, he would then consider what justice was, and do his duty to his own State as well as to them.

He would prefer that they would legislate on some general system, for it was not right to be guided by local interests, as it was impossible for him to know what might be the principal interest in this or that question which might arise. He desired to lop off every branch of corrupt Executive patronage which had crept into the land system during the last ten or fifteen years. He believed a graduation system might be necessary as a matter of justice to the rights of the States, but he would advocate some general system, founded on enlightened and statesmanlike views, which would do honor to the country, and not upon this colonial system of the last few years.

Mr. P. concluded by expressing a hope that the whole subject would be suffered to rest until the next Congress, and that his friend from Illinois would not press his motion of instructions.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON moved to amend the instructions submitted by Mr. REYNOLDS, by substituting the following:

"To refer to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report a bill to have the proceeds of the sale of the public domain divided among the States in an equitable ratio, to be used by the States for internal improvements, education, or any other purpose, as may be deemed wise by the several States receiving said distribution."

Mr. JOHNSON then advocated his amendment at some length; after which,

Mr. HUBBARD took the floor to reply to some of the statements of Mr. JOHNSON; and, in so doing, proposed to illustrate the accuracy of his own position by reference to statistical facts, having reference to the value of waste lands in Alabama, &c.

Mr. H. had not proceeded far, when he said that this was a more important subject—that the discussion had been sprung suddenly on the House—that he should like time for consideration—and that if any member would move an adjournment, he would yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Mississippi, then moved that when the House adjourn, it will adjourn over to Monday; which was agreed to.

An adjournment was then moved, and the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative: Yeas 59, nays 94.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to postpone the subject until the second Tuesday in January next; which he afterwards withdrew.

And another motion was made to adjourn, which prevailed. And the House adjourned until Monday.

IN SENATE.

Mr. WALKER also gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill relative to the two-per cent. fund of the State of Mississippi.

TAXING BANK NOTES.

Mr. BENFON said when the Senate was last in session, he asked leave to introduce a bill to tax paper issues, to which it was objected that it was not constitutional to introduce such a bill in this body, and he had therefore asked and obtained leave to withdraw it. But he now wished to give notice to the Senate, and to the country, that he should offer that bill in the form of an amendment to the first revenue bill to which it was applicable; and in the mean time he would ask leave to have the bill printed as an amendment. He had struck out the title of the bill, and simply wished that it might be printed and laid on the table, that any gentleman who desired to turn his attention to the subject, might have the opportunity to do so, and that gentlemen might not be taken by surprise.

The PRESIDENT having stated the question to the Senate,

Mr. KING said he presumed it was not necessary to state to the Chair that the subject-matter to which it was intended to offer this bill as an amendment, was not yet before the Senate, and therefore it could not be received in that form. It had been usual to receive and print amendments as a courtesy to Senators, but never before the proposition to which the amendment was desired to be made had been introduced. He thought the Senator from Missouri was not now in order, but that he would have to wait until the revenue bill to which it would have to be attached, came up. He (Mr. King) had no wish to prevent the bill going before the country, but he desired that they should adhere to what was regular and proper in their forms of proceeding.

The PRESIDENT remarked that the subject was with the Senate for decision.

Mr. BENFON said perhaps he could relieve the Senate. His object was to give notice to the Senate and to the country that he should pursue this subject, and at his earliest convenience; that being done, if gentlemen would look at the subject, he had no desire to have the amendment printed, though he had been anxious to avoid taking them by surprise. However, he would not now press his motion.

COMMERCIAL RECIPROCITY.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial from inhabitants of Newburyport, Mass. praying for the repeal or modification of the act of 29th May, 1830, regulating commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonies, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. He spoke in support of the prayer of the memorial, but was inaudible at the Reporters' desk.

Mr. WEBSTER had not been aware that his colleague was about to present a memorial on this most important subject; but he desired to say that if it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, he hoped the committee would consider thoroughly and carefully the whole extent, and all the consequences of that system of policy which they had been for some years in the habit of calling the reciprocity system. He (Mr. WEBSTER) was not then prepared to express any opinion whether, when the reciprocity treaty expired, it should be renewed, nor on other matters in connection therewith; but he did hope that the Committee on Foreign Relations would come to no hasty conclusion on this question. He was perfectly satisfied that the subject should take the direction proposed; but he only hoped, and he confidently hoped, that the committee would make a large survey not only of this particular relation, but of all the consequences of those treaties, which have been in existence for the last fifteen or twenty, if not twenty-five years, many of which were entirely destitute of all the essential principles of reciprocity.

Mr. DAVIS had looked at this subject for some time as one which was entitled to all the consideration which his colleague thought it deserved—for some years he had seen the development of facts of a striking character. But a few years ago memorials were presented in this chamber, from merchants of Baltimore, setting forth the unequal advantages which they enjoyed in the transshipment of tobacco to Germany, as one result of a treaty, to which he now referred, as a sample of the treaties of reciprocity, which, instead of affording reciprocal advantages, drove the Baltimore merchants entirely out of the trade. He could point out many more such results in the operation of these treaties, to show the necessity of an examination of a system, as suggested by his colleague, which was of very doubtful policy, as regarded the interests of this country.

At the request of Mr. CALHOUN, the memorial was read.

Mr. BUCHANAN then said, certainly this was a very important subject; it was a request to change that policy of the country which they had been endeavoring to carry into effect with all foreign nations since the year 1815. That it was disastrous in some respects, particularly in regard to our commerce with some of the Hanse Towns, there could be no doubt; but why refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations? It was a subject peculiarly relating to the commerce and navigation of the country; and the question was, how have these treaties of reciprocity operated on those two great interests, which in that body were exclusively committed to the Committee on Commerce? It was not a subject connected with their foreign relations, except incidentally; and he moved, therefore, that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which was its appropriate reference.

Mr. DAVIS had moved its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, because it referred to a conventional agreement of the treaty-making power between the British Colonies and the United States. If, however, it would more appropriately go to the Committee on Commerce, he was willing that it should go there.

Mr. CALHOUN said it appeared to him that, in the first instance, it should be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and, after that committee had reported, it might be proper to refer their report to the Committee on Foreign Relations. This was the old subject, which the Government had so long found it difficult to manage satisfactorily, and he apprehended it never would be managed satisfactorily. If the difficulties could be overcome, he should rejoice; for there was no man on that floor who took a deeper interest than he did in the prosperity, navigation and commerce of the country.

Mr. DAVIS was satisfied to withdraw his motion, and let it go to the Committee on Commerce.

After a few words from Mr. MERRICK,

Mr. KNIGHT said, whatever committee this memorial might be referred to, he hoped the attention of the committee would be drawn to the operation of these treaties, and particularly to the arrangement in regard to the West India trade, and the effect on the trade and navigation of the country. So far as he was informed, this arrangement had been favorable to the British navigation, and injurious to our own. He believed it to be a fact, now ascertained, that the British tonnage had greatly increased, and that our tonnage in this trade of the Colonies had diminished. In olden times we used to import molasses, rum, salt, sugar, and other commodities, from the West Indies in our own vessels; but under the arrangement, large quantities of these articles are brought in British vessels, and much from the Northern colonies where they are not grown or manufactured, clearly giving to the British an advantage which we do not possess. He wished the committee also to inquire whether the existing arrangement is reciprocal in its provisions and operations. He understood that the British vessels are now allowed to carry certain goods, wares, and merchandize from this country to the West Indies, which ours are not permitted to carry, and in this particular a decided preference is given to the British navigator over our own. These are some of the points which it is desirable should be investigated by the committee. Discriminating duties, also, in favor of the Colonies, should not escape the attention of the committee.

Mr. KING said he would greatly prefer that it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, especially if the Committee on Commerce was to be merely a conduit through which it should pass to the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was not unwilling to take any labor that might be necessarily imposed upon him in the public service, as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce; but as our foreign relations required a re-examination, it would be better that this subject should now go to the committee to which it most ultimately go.

Mr. BUCHANAN trusted that it would not go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The question was, whether it was advisable to renew our treaty with Great Britain—whether, when this treaty shall expire, it shall be renewed again? These Newburyport merchants say it ought not, in their opinion, and who was to decide that question? It would be necessary to take a general and broad view of the effect of this treaty on the commerce of the country; and to decide that important question, it should be referred to a committee acquainted with the subject. How could the Committee on Foreign Relations determine a question respecting the effect produced on their commerce? If it were sent to them, it would be sent to a committee, the members of which were supposed not to have entered into its consideration at all, while the Committee on Commerce, during the entire session, were in the daily consideration of questions exclusively connected with it, and therefore he again hoped it would go to the Committee on Commerce. But he had another remark. If this subject was to be investigated as it ought, and as its importance required that it should be, it could not possibly be done so as to make a satisfactory report at the present session. They would have to go back through a variety of sources to ascertain what effect these reciprocity treaties had had on our commerce, and this information could not be collected in the six weeks or two months the Congress would be in session. And then the country must have time to reflect on it after it was collected, and in the expectation that this memorial was to be sent to a committee, the members of which were not conversant with the subject, he had no hesitation in saying that it was idle and vain to suppose they could accomplish any thing this session. He thought the Committee on Commerce might be in possession of information on this subject, and might, therefore, be able to make a report at the present session, though he much doubted; but he was satisfied nothing could grow out of the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Senate then divided on the question of reference to the Committee on Commerce, which was decided in the affirmative by a vote of 19 to 9; and the memorial was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to pay the outfit to Commodore Porter, not provided for when he was appointed Minister, resident at Constantinople.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following motion; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to enable the President of the United States to negotiate for the extinction of the Indian titles to the unpurchased lands lying in the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama submitted the following motion, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a Marshal and District Attorney for the Middle District of Alabama.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate a copy of the correspondence between the Department and the Governor of the State of Indiana relative to the lands granted in that State by the act of March 2, 1827, for that part of the Wabash and Erie Canal which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and the line of the State of Ohio, which could not be set off to the State of Indiana in the adjustment that took place in 1829 and 1830, in consequence of the Indian title thereto not being then extinguished.

And that he also report what quantity of land the State of Indiana is still entitled to, under said act, for that portion of said canal, and what portion of the same has been granted to individuals as Indian reservations by treaty with the Miamies.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of assigning the present district judge of the United States for the State of Mississippi to one of the districts of said State, and of appointing a separate judge for the remaining district.

The following bills were considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

A bill granting a pension to Lemuel White.
A bill for the relief of Margaret Barnes, widow of Elijah Barnes.

A bill granting a pension to David Waller.
A bill for the relief of Samuel Collins.
A bill for the relief of Joseph Bassett.
A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Richard T. Banks of the State of Arkansas.

A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to adjust and pay to Benjamin Murphy, of Arkansas, the value of his corn, cattle, and hogs, taken by the Cherokee Indians in the month of Dec. 1828.
A bill for the relief of Joab Seely.

A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to procure steam vessels for the revenue service.

A bill allowing drawback on foreign merchandise exported in the original packages to Chihuahua and San Felipe, in Mexico.

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," passed the 18th day of April, 1816.

A bill for the relief of William P. Rathbone.
A bill further to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," approved March 3, 1839.

The bill making an appropriation to complete the removal of the raft of Red river, and for other purposes, was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole, and, after some remarks by Mr. KING, showing the propriety and necessity of its passage, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to revive the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, being taken up—

Mr. TAPPAN thought they ought to wait until they had received some papers that were ordered to be printed on the subject.

Mr. MERRICK would be glad, then, if Senators who were desirous to enter into the discussion of this bill, would agree to fix an early day for that purpose.

Mr. TAPPAN would agree with the Senator from Maryland in the appointment of an early day, when the papers to which he referred were received.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, coming up in order,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he had the honor to report that bill, and he was anxious to have it disposed of; but he wished to take no advantage of Senators, there being several absent from their seats, and therefore he would consent to pass it by informally. It was a bill on which he wished to have a full Senate, that they might all show their hands on the question of its passage.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said, then it would be desirable to assign a particular day for the bill.

Mr. CLAY replied, that a particular day had been named, and it came up this morning as a special order; but as the Senate was not full, he was willing it should be passed informally, and it could be then taken up to-morrow, or any subsequent convenient day.

After a few remarks from Messrs. MERRICK, HUBBARD, WRIGHT, and others, the bill was passed by informally.

A bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company being taken up as in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said this bill had passed at previous sessions of Congress, and therefore it would not be necessary that he should enter into an explanation of its provisions, unless it were desired by some gentlemen on that floor.

Mr. BENTON wished to have some further explanation on one or two points. He wished to know what progress had been made in the construction of this road, what probability there was of its speedy completion, and whether there was an adequacy of means with those engaged in it. He had a decided objection to see the United States forcing on any of these works, unless it were such as could be carried speedily through—he had no idea that the United States should take the laboring oar for the carrying on any of these works, or contributing where the work was not going on prosperously, and where the means of those engaged in it were inadequate to its completion; and he wished, therefore, the Senator from Alabama would inform him what was the state of the road, whether it was in a state of progression, whether there was a probability of its termination, what were the means of those engaged in it, and whether they were adequate to its successful accomplishment.

Mr. CLAY could only repeat what he had said on other occasions, that there was no sort of question in regard to the adequacy of the means of the company, for much the greater portion of the stock was taken by men of capital and respectability in the State of Alabama; nor could there be a doubt of the rapid advance of the work. The track was laid out, the whole of it was surveyed, and much of it was graded; and from the commencement at the Alabama river, there were excavations and embankments completed from 30 to 40 miles; and the road then entered a valley where neither by excavation nor embankment was necessary for some 60 or 70 miles. Of the importance of the work, he observed that this road was the connecting link between North Alabama and the bay of Mobile; and between the Tennessee river and the waters of the bay of Mobile; and let this road be opened, and it would open an important means of commercial transit, both to the State of Alabama and the State of Tennessee; it would likewise afford the means of defence of that part of our coast, by the rapid conveyance of men and munitions of war in any emergency. It was well known that the means of defence of Mobile and New Orleans must always come from the upper country and this company was willing to undertake the responsibility of conveying men and munitions of war at all times, free of all charge, to the vulnerable points. He hoped the gentleman was now satisfied. The work hitherto, under the peculiar circumstances of the times, had progressed less rapidly than could have been desired, but still it had progressed, and would be completed. This bill proposed to make no donation—it merely gave a pre-emption right. The land was of but little value; and it was but right that this company should have the advantage of whatever increased value they, by their enterprise, gave to the land.

Mr. BENTON inquired whether the work was actually going on.

Mr. CLAY replied in the affirmative; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After a short Executive session,
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, December 28, 1840.

Mr. SMITH of Maine, on leave, presented the petition of J. B. Glover and others, of New York, praying for the passage of a bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The following bills from the Senate were then read a first and second time, and referred to the appropriate committees, viz:

An act granting a pension to Hannah Leighton.
An act to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes."

An act to prevent the counterfeiting any foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States, or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin.

An act for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians.

An act supplementary to "An act to provide for the adjustment of titles to land in the town of Detroit, and Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes," passed April 21, 1806.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER announced that the next business in order, was the motion of Mr. REYNOLDS of Illinois, to refer a memorial from the Legislature of that State to the Committee on Public Lands, with the following instructions:

"To report a bill to grant prospective pre-emptions to settlers on the public lands, and to reduce the price to settlers according to the value of said lands."

The question pending was on the following amendment, submitted by Mr. W. COST JOHNSON

"To refer to the Committee on Public Lands with instructions to report a bill to have the proceeds of the sale of the public domain divided among the States in an equitable ratio, to be used by the States for internal improvements, education, or any other purpose, as may be deemed wise by the several States receiving said distribution."

Mr. HUBBARD, being entitled to the floor, was about to resume his remarks, when he gave way to

Mr. CHINN, who moved to lay the whole subject on the table; but after some conversation, withdrew it, and moved a postponement of the subject until Tuesday week.

Mr. ALFORD renewed the motion to lay on the table; and the yeas and nays being demanded, were ordered, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Anderson, Linn Banks, Barnard, Beirne, Bell, Bond, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, Chinn, Chittenden, Cole, Connor, Cranston, Cushing, Garret Davis, Dawson, Filmore, Floyd, Fornance, Garland, Gates, Giddings, Granger, Griffin, Habersham, Hawes, Hill of North Carolina, Hopkins, Hunt, Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, McKay, Mallory, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Parmenter, Paynter, Peck, Pickens, Randall, Reed, Saltonstall, Shepard, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Tahafarro, Triplett, Trumbull, Warren, John White, and Winthrop—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boardman, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Wm. B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Clifford, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Curtis, Dana, E. Davies, Deberry, Dellet, Doan, Doe, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Ely, Everett, Fine, Fisher, Galbraith, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Goode, Hand, John Hastings, Henry, Hillen, Hook, Hubbard, James, Jameson, Charles Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Keim, Kempshall, Kille, Lane, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, Marchand, Marvin, Mason, Medill Miller, Mitchell, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Morrow, Newhard, Palen, Parrish, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Randolph, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Ryall, Simon-ton, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeney, F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, John R. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Waterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—111.

So the House refused to lay on table.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. CHINN to postpone all further consideration of the subject until Tuesday week,

The SPEAKER suggested that on that day the Pennsylvania contested election case would come up as the special order; whereon,

Mr. CHINN modified his motion so as to read "next Wednesday week;" also that it be made the special order for that day.

Mr. REYNOLDS opposed the motion to postpone. He thought gentlemen could act upon the subject as well now as any other time. If it were postponed until a later period of the session, the cry would then arise, that there was not time to consider it.

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the previous question, but there was no second.

The question then recurring on the motion to postpone until Wednesday week, it was taken and decided in the affirmative.

The question then being on the latter branch of the motion, making the subject the special order for Wednesday week, was taken, and decided in the negative.

So the further consideration of the subject is postponed until next Wednesday week, on which day it will come up in its order.

NAVY PENSIONS.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS asked the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill reported by him from the Committee on Naval Affairs last week, making appropriation for the payment of navy pensions. He reminded the House that the money would become due on the first of January, so that prompt action on the bill was absolutely necessary.

Mr. T. then moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the bill.

Mr. PROFFIT objected.

Mr. THOMAS explained the urgency of the bill, after which the objection was withdrawn.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. McKAY in the chair,) and took up the above bill, which was read by the Clerk, as follows:

A BILL concerning navy pensions and half-pay.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of one hundred and fifty-one thousand three hundred and fifty-two dollars and thirty-nine cents, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions and half-pay chargeable on the navy pension fund.

At the request of Mr. THOMAS, the Clerk then read the following document from the Secretary of the Navy, which had been forwarded by the President, in compliance with a resolution of the House:

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1840.

Sir: I herewith transmit a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the navy pension fund, to which the attention of Congress is invited, and recommend an immediate appropriation of $151,352 39, to meet the payment of pensions becoming due on and after the 1st of January, 1841.

M. VAN BUREN.

HON. R. M. T. HUNTER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 1, 1840.

Sir: I have the honor to state that the whole amount of money now on hand to pay navy pensioners, is $18 647 61; and that there will be required in addition thereto, for that purpose, for the ensuing year—1841—the sum of $151,352 39; of which the sum of $51,476 73 will be wanted to meet claims for pensions becoming due on the 1st day of January next.

The stocks at present owned by the navy pension fund are:

City of Cincinnati five per cent.	-	-	$100,000
City of Washington five per cent.	-	-	33,339
Bank of Washington	-	-	14,000
Union Bank of Georgetown	-	-	11,460

Nominal value - - - - $158,739

All these stocks have greatly depreciated in value, and some of them are now altogether unsaleable. The stock of the city of Cincinnati, standing highest, has been advertised to be sold at auction on the 15th of this month, (December,) for the purpose, in the first place, of reimbursing the Bank of America the sum of fifty thousand dollars advanced to the fund on a deposit of the said stock, to meet the payment of pensions which became due on the 1st of July last, and afterwards to meet, as far as it may suffice, the payments falling due on the 1st of January next.

To liquidate these and other claims becoming due in the year 1841, and at the same time to prevent the great sacrifice which must ensue if the stocks belonging to the fund be sold at this time, I have the honor to request that you will be pleased to call the attention of Congress to the subject at the commencement of its approaching session, and to recommend an immediate appropriation of the above named sum of $151,352 39 in aid of the fund; the deficiency in its means of satisfying the just claims of pensioners, which by the act of Congress of 23d April, 1800, the public faith was pledged to supply, having occurred.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

J. K. PAULDING.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

Mr. F. THOMAS then made a brief explanation of the acts relating to the bill. He explained that, by the act of 1800, pensions were granted to seamen, officers, and marines in the naval service who had been disabled; and that, by the 9th section, a peculiar mode of paying these pensions was provided; the fund was to be derived not from the general revenue of the Government, but from the sale of that portion of the prizes to which the United States might become entitled. He explained also that, by the 9th section, the faith of the United States was pledged, in the event of the exhaustion of the fund, to make good the deficit. The Secretary of the Navy stated that this specific fund had been so far exhausted as to be reduced to a very small amount in stocks, most of which were now unsaleable, and he applied to Congress to make this appropriation for the purpose of saving those stocks from sacrifice.

Mr. T. then proceeded to reply to an objection which, he said, he anticipated would be made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS.) There was a contrariety of opinion in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and might be, Mr. T. supposed, in this House, as to the construction of the law of 3d March, 1837, under which this pension fund of 1800 had been exhausted. It would be seen that Congress, by the act of 1800, had given pensions to officers, seamen, and marines disabled; and, as he had said, by the ninth section, the faith of the Government was pledged to make good any deficiency in the fund if it should become exhausted. By the law of 1837, and by other laws which it was not necessary for him to refer to, another class of persons had been authorized to apply for these pensions other than those contemplated by the original act; and their pensions were to commence from the time when the incident occurred which gave origin to the pensions. Under this act, Mr. T. explained that arranges had been allowed of twenty or thirty years. He anticipated that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) would assume the ground that the Secretary had erred in giving that construction to the law of 1837. He anticipated the gentleman would say that Congress gave a pledge to make good any deficiency in the fund in the event of that fund being applied solely to pensioners contemplated under the law of 1800, to wit, to officers, seamen, and marines, actually disabled in the public service. Now, it seemed to him (Mr. T.) that whatever might be the construction given to the act, the bill before the committee ought to become a law, even if the Secretary of the Navy had committed an error. If the fund was exhausted, the Government stood bound to reimburse it. The Committee on Naval Affairs intended, before the close of the session, to bring in a bill to repeal the act of 1837, and intended to incorporate in it certain provisions diminishing the number of persons entitled to make these claims upon the Government. The simple question now was, whether the Government, in virtue of its plighted faith, would now make good a deficiency in the pension fund of 1800; that fund having been exhausted under what some gentlemen might suppose to be a misconception of the act of 1837.

Mr. ADAMS desired to know if the sum embraced in the present bill was included in the estimate for the year.

Mr. THOMAS said, that so far as he was informed, he believed not.

Mr. ADAMS then complained that the recommendation from the President was, that Congress should not exceed the estimates, and yet one week afterwards the House was urged to make an appropriation not included in the estimates. Mr. A. then went on to contend that the Secretary of the Navy, under the act of 1837, had no authority to make use of the specific fund set apart for the payment of pensioners under the act of 1800. Also, that by this act the Treasury of the United States had been saddled with a national debt, and for the payment of which they were called upon to make an appropriation not in the estimates. Mr. A. then proceeded to show that in 1837 the amount of the specific fund was $1,200,000, the interest from which, he contended, was sufficient to meet the demands upon it. He wished to know what had become of this money. Why, it appeared from the letter of the Secretary that it had been exhausted not for the payment of the pensioners, for whom it had been set apart, but for the widows, orphans, and perhaps the aunts of persons who might have been in the service. After some further remarks, Mr. A. went on to charge the Administration with a want of economy in thus "wasting" so much money, sacredly set apart, as he contended, for another specific purpose. He wished to know how the act of 1837 originated, and by whom it was passed through the House. He desired to examine who had introduced the measure, and to see whether was a Whig or an Administration "economist."

Mr. A. then, at much length, gave his views in relation to the investment of Government money in State stocks and bonds, and contended that the Secretary of the Navy had no authority for making such investments. He contended that the investment of money in State stocks by the Government, was in fact assuming the State debts.

Mr. F. THOMAS declining to reply, owing to the necessity of a speedy passage of the bill,

The committee then rose and reported the bill to the House, without amendment.

Mr. REED made some brief remarks in defence of the Secretary of the Navy, who, in his opinion, was often blamed when the fault lay in the law. He had risen, however, more particularly to request that the House would ere long afford him an opportunity of speaking upon the affairs of the navy—a privilege he had often wished during the last session, but never had.

After some remarks from Mr. WISE, who took the same general view of the case as Mr. ADAMS, and, among other matters, complained of the delay in bringing this subject before the House,

Mr. THOMAS (chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) said that he had designed to suffer this bill to pass without any comment on his part, for he had not felt himself called upon to reply to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts on the general policy of the Administration, particularly as he, as well as the hononable gentleman from Virginia who had just resumed his seat, had commenced their speeches by declaring that it was their purpose to vote for the bill. He was anxious to have it pass the House this day and go to the Senate, that the little remnant of this fund might be saved, and the demands of the Government to pay the existing pensions might be met in time; (for which purpose one hundred and fifty thousand dollars would be wanting on the first of January next.) But he could not sit still and hear such extraordinary charges advanced against the Secretary of the Navy without making some reply. If there ever was an officer of Government whose conduct was not only unworthy of blame, but deserved the highest praise for his fidelity, the Secretary was that officer. No sooner did he find himself in office, than his attention was immediately turned to this pension law of 1837; and at the very next session he failed not to warn Congress that if the law was suffered to remain as it stood, the navy pension fund would shortly be absorbed in its application to an object for which that fund had never been originally created. In the Senate, this warning took effect, and the law was repealed; but the bill of repeal was lost in the House; why, Mr. T. could not say. They all knew how time was often wasted in that body by irrelevant and latitudinous discussion. He did not find fault with this, because he believed that, upon the whole, the country was benefited by it. The Committee on Naval Affairs had reported a bill to put a stop to this waste and misapplication of the fund, but it never had been acted upon. Thus much on the delay which had taken place.

Now as to the actual operation of the law of 1837. He wished the House to see whether the fund had not been exhausted through the legitimate interpretation of that law. The gentleman from Virginia had fallen into most strange mistakes, in his apprehension of the subject, to confute which it would be only necessary to look at the law. [Mr. T. here quoted the act of 1837.] From this it appeared that there were two classes of pensioners contemplated: 1, the widows and children of officers, seamen, or marines, who had died in the public service; and 2, persons who had been personally disabled by wounds or injuries received in such service. In both cases the law was not prospective merely, but retrospective also. It not only granted pensions in future, but required that the pension should be reckoned back to the death of the officer, seaman, or marine, and to the date of the disability incurred. In this manner there had been paid in a single year, to 92 invalids, the sum of $78,000, to 85 widows the sum of $121,000, and to 129 children $129,000.

Here was a gross sum of $329,000 paid as arrears, besides the annual pensions which were to be provided for.

Mr. WISE here explained, and insisted that, even according to Mr. T.'s own showing, there ought to be a large balance still left in the hands of the Department.

Mr. THOMAS said he had only stated the result of the operation of the law for a period of six months from the 31 of March to the 30th of September, 1837. The law had continued in force to this day.

Mr. WISE again interposed, and referred to a report which stated the gross amount of arrears at about $300,000; and inquired how much it had been since increased?

Mr. THOMAS said he held in his hand another account from the Navy Department, giving the particulars of another amount paid in the form of arrearages, exceeding $800,000. If gentlemen would look fully into the subject, instead of taking partial views, they would find that every dollar of the fund was accounted for.

Mr. WISE According to that, there ought to be no balance at all left, but the Secretary reports a balance.

Mr. THOMAS said there was about $158,000 left still, on the first of December last. But whence did this law which had led to such a result emanate? Who authorized this application of the pension fund? It was not the Secretary of the Navy or the Commissioner of Pensions, but the two Houses of Congress. Who were the authors of the bill? It had been reported to the Senate by the honorable Mr. ROBINSON of Illinois, and sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which Mr. SOUTHARD was a member, and he had reported the bill to the Senate, by whom it had been passed without a division. The Senate bill, coming into the House, had been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House. Mr. T. read the names of this committee, among which that of Mr. WISE was one. The bill had been ordered to its third reading without a division, and passed by the House without amendment.

Mr. WISE explained, stating that, though his name appeared on the Naval Committee, he was not responsible for the bill. He was at that time but nominally one of the committee—his attention was directed elsewhere—he had other fish to fry—and could no longer attend to the business of that committee, (of which he had previously been an active member,) being appointed on another occasion which occupied his time and thoughts.

Mr. THOMAS had not the least suspicion as to that gentleman's course in relation to the bill. The responsibility rested on the whole House. Congress passed the law, and ordered the Secretary to administer it. That officer had warned them how it would operate and was operating. And was he then to be arraigned for carrying out an act which was the law of the land?

Mr. REED (also a member of the Naval Committee) here made some explanation which was totally inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. THOMAS, then resuming, observed that he concurred fully with such part of the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) as related to the policy of leaving in the hands of Heads of Departments the discretionary power of buying and selling on public account stocks of any description. He had raised his feeble voice against such a practice many years ago. But while the authority remained, he trusted that parties accused, as the Secretary of the Navy had been, would be tried by the law as it stood. That, if he had for his acts the express authority of law, he would be acquitted. And if such authority were in itself wrong, Congress would withdraw it, but not unjustly charge the fault of the law on the officer who executed it. Now, as the navy pension fund originated from prize-money taken in time of war, and as the United States had had neither war nor prizes for some years, he inferred that, as the Secretary would violate his duty should he let the fund lie idle in his hands, the investment of it in stock had been made some fifteen years ago.

Mr. ADAMS here interposed to say that those investments had all taken place since 1837, and never before.

Mr. THOMAS, resuming, said that he referred to the capital of the fund. It was the interest which had been invested; and in thus vesting it, the Secretary had but followed the course of his predecessors. The law itself provided that the Secretary might vest the interest of the fund in any way he thought best. [Mr. T. here quoted the law.] The present Secretary could, however, have had but a small sum to invest in any way. Whether the investment had been prudently made or not, Mr. T. would not now express an opinion; he rather supposed, however, that it would be admitted to be better to place the money in State stocks, rather than in those of any private corporation. The fault, if any, was in Congress, in not laying down a rule specifying in what stock the interest of this fund should be invested. As to the sale of the stocks which had been purchased, it was an operation indispensable to meet the engagements of the Government. Mr. T. observed, in conclusion, that he had not attempted to go into a reply to the speech of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] nor did he feel bound to do so. He was not in the same situation with that gentleman, having a speech prepared for delivery at a former session.

Mr. MONROE said the Congress of 1837 had disposed of a fund over which they had no control; and it was the duty of the representatives to replace the fund, repeal the act of 1837, acknowledge the debt, and pay the interest; and that interest would pay the pensioners annually.

Mr. ANDERSON of Maine followed; but owing to the customary loud conversation near the Reporters' desk, not one word in a dozen could be heard with distinctness.

Mr. SHEPARD moved to amend the bill, by adding the following, to come in as an additional section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the act of March 3, 1837, entitled, An act for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund, be repealed.

Mr. REED objected to the amendment. He thought its adoption at this time would be too precipitate. He wished a full and careful examination before the law should be repealed.

After some brief remarks from Mr. TILLINGHAST,

Mr. PECK demanded the previous question, which was seconded by the House.

The main question was then ordered, and, being put, first on the amendment, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Wm. B. Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Connor, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Dana, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Everett, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Galbraith, Garland, Gerry, Giddings, Griffin, Hand, Hawes, Hill of North Carolina, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Montanya, Parris, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Reynolds, Jas. Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, Albert Smith, Stearns, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Vroom, Watterson, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Barnard, Beatty, Boardman, Calhoun, Carter, Chittenden, Clark, Cranston, Edward Davies, John Davis, Dellet, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, Gates, Goggin, Goode, Granger, Graves, Green, Habersham, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hillen, Hook, James, Kempshall, Kille, Lane, Leet, Lincoln, McCarty, McCulloch, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Naylor, Newhard, Osborne, Palen, Paynter, Peck, Randall, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Wise—70.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading, was put, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WATTERSON,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, December 29, 1840.

DEATH OF HON. FELIX GRUNDY.

Immediately after the reading of the journal,

Mr. ANDERSON rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: By the last mail, I received from Nashville the sad intelligence of the death of my esteemed friend and distinguished colleague, and I rise to announce the event to the Senate. He died at Nashville on the 19th instant. I have no words adequate to express my deep regret for this great public loss. I will not indulge, upon this occasion, in mere expressions of private grief, though I might find pardon and sympathy in the bosoms of many of his personal and endeared friends who surround me. They will feel with me that they have lost a friend who merited their esteem, and in whose social qualities the kindness of the heart was ever conspicuous, and never, for a moment, extinguished by party contests. But, sir, in bringing this melancholy event to the notice of the Senate, I am reminded not only of the claims of private friendship—of the loss which I feel that I have suffered in his death—but that I am about to ask the action of this body in reference to a man who was one of the Patriots and State-men of this land—a man of whom it may be said, truly, that he was the artificer of his own fortunes, and wore those honors meekly, which his fidelity and talents had won in many a well contested field of mental action.

His loss is a public misfortune; and it will sink deep and lastingly into the bosoms of his countrymen.

He was born in 1777, in the county of Berkley, in the Old Dominion, that mother of patriots and great statesmen. His father emigrated in 1780 to Kentucky. At an early period he was left an orphan, guided and cherished by a mother on whom misfortune had cast its deepest shadows. He was liberally educated at the Academy of Bardstown, Kentucky, then under the superintendence of Dr. PRIESTLY, and passed his scholastic days in honorable rivalry with such men as ROWAN, POPE, and DAVIS.

He studied law with that eminent civilian and ardent patriot, GEORGE NICHOLAS. In selecting the legal profession, he consulted his natural taste and cast of mind; and when he came to the bar, he soon acquired the confidence and patronage of the public. In 1799, when a convention was called in Kentucky to revise the Constitution, he was chosen as a member of that body from the county of Washington; and was afterwards elected to the Legislature of that State, and was the author of what is denominated the circuit court system, by which justice was brought nearer to the hands and the doors of the people.

He was subsequently elected to the Legislature of Kentucky. He continued in that station from 1802 until 1806, when he was made one of the Supreme Judges of the State, and, at the transfer of Judge TODD to the Supreme Court of the United States, he was made Chief Justice. In 1808 he resigned that office, emigrated to Tennessee, and engaged in the practice of the law. The same success followed his efforts there. The popular confidence was early bestowed upon him, and when our difficulties with Great Britain excited the apprehension that they could not be amicably adjusted, his patriotism, his zeal, his wisdom, and his talent, pointed him out as the man peculiarly qualified with whom to entrust such high interests—and I believe he was elected without opposition from the Nashville district, a member of the Congress of 1811 and 1812. He was placed during that memorable period, by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, then Speaker of the House, upon the Committee of Foreign Relations, which was composed of some of the ablest men of the nation. It was with such men that he was rated, and it was then that he first became known to the whole country, and equally distinguished for his wisdom in council, his untiring zeal, and his powerful and inspiring eloquence. It was the meridian of his life, and the fire of his youth had not subsided; that gentler, perhaps not less lofty strain of eloquence to which we have listened here in his latter days, marked then his efforts, but they had also an added strength, and energy, and point, that gave to all he said the highest force.

After his retirement from his position there, he was elected to the Legislature of Tennessee, and continued to act a valuable and distinguished part in the councils of his adopted State. In 1829, he was elected a member of this body. In this station he continued until 1837, when he resigned his seat—and was afterwards called to the cabinet by the present President, and was again returned to the Senate at the commencement of this Congress.

Of his action here I need not speak. Of one thing, I think I am certain—he has left no enemy in this body, and many warm, very warm and devoted friends, who will long cherish his memory. That gentle but mighty spirit, that could move so powerfully upon others, has itself been finally acted upon by the Giver of all good; and we are permitted to cherish the belief that it now rests in the bosom of our Heavenly Father. He was aware of the immediate change that was about to translate him from time to eternity. He contemplated it with calmness and Christian resignation, in the humble hope that he would be numbered among the spirits of the redeemed made perfect. Religion had smoothed his path, and made his dying bed soft and gentle to his heart as the downy pillow.

We shall hear his voice no more, but we will cherish his memory—for his was a spirit ever kind, noble, and bland as a summer's morning. His eloquence charmed and delighted; often confounded, but never repelled the admiration of his adversary. His friends—his State—his whole country, will deplore his death as a public calamity. History will attest that his life has been closed through a long path of toil, of patriotism, of honor, and of fame.

Mr. A. then offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the honorable FELIX GRUNDY, late a member thereof, will go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the honorable FELIX GRUNDY, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BENTON rose and said, that among the number of Senators now present, to whom a long and friendly intercourse with our deceased brother Senator would give the right of seconding the motion to confer honors upon his memory, he claimed to be one, and that on account of a friendly intercourse between them long before their meeting in this chamber. Judge GRUNDY, after having attained the highest professional advancement in the State of his first adoption—after having at an early age become Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Kentucky—after having earned the highest distinctions of the bar and of the Legislative body, amidst the brilliant competition of genius and talent which illustrated that young State—after achieving all this, at that early age, when many are just commencing the serious business of life, he removed to the State of Tennessee, there to recommence his distinguished professional career. This was in the year 1806. My law license, said Mr. B. was just then signed. I was then a briefless young lawyer at the Nashville bar, and quickly had occasion to experience, in the conduct of the distinguished new comer, the generous and brotherly feeling which leads the elder members of the profession to lend a helping hand to the younger. To bear lightly on the errors of inexperience—to aid with advice—to extol what was praiseworthy—to encourage every honorable effort—was his conduct to me as well as to all other beginners in the arduous career of the law. Thus commenced our acquaintance, in the exercise of personal and political friendship, thirty-four years ago; and the friendly intercourse then began, has been continued upon a higher and different theatre until death has closed the door upon the progress of his meritorious and eventful life. These circumstances give me a right, among the many who are here and could so justly claim it—they give me a right to appear as the second to the motion which has just been made. The Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. ANDERSON,] the last colleague of the deceased, has well portrayed the character of Judge GRUNDY—has well presented the leading events of his distinguished life, the high order of his talents, the benevolence of his heart, and the amenity of his manners. He has sketched the outline, with a friendly and a just hand, of these events and qualities. To fill up that outline, and to give the details of that picture which he has so beautifully presented, would require a time and an opportunity which the present sudden and melancholy occasion does not permit. He has done all which the occasion permits. He has presented the picture of a good man, and of a great man, rising to eminence by the exercise of virtue and talents, and dispensing private happiness in the family and social circle, while discharging the highest duties of the jurist, the statesman, and the patriot. He has done more: he has been able to present—the life of our deceased friend enabled him to present it—he has been able to crown the picture which he has drawn, with that feature without which all human character would be imperfect; he has been able to present him as a Christian. To this, said Mr. B. I can have nothing more, on this occasion, to add; and, therefore, fulfil my purpose in rising, by seconding the motion which has been made to bestow our last honors on the memory of our deceased brother Senator, Judge GRUNDY.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, Dec. 29, 1840.

After the journal had been read, Mr. GIDDINGS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which, on yesterday, the House had passed the bill making appropriation for the payment of and which contained an amendment repealing the act of 1837.

Mr. REED, after some preliminary remarks, moved a postponement of the subject until Tuesday next, in order that the bill might be printed, and an opportunity afforded to members to examine it.

Mr. F. THOMAS hoped that the motion to postpone would not be pressed, as the money appropriated in the bill would become due on the first of January.

Mr. ADAMS contended that the amendment repealing the act of 1837 was an inconsistency; for while the bill itself appropriated money to pay pensions under that act, the amendment took away the authority for paying them.

Mr. REED, at the suggestion of several members, withdrew the motion to postpone.

Mr. TILLINGHAST made some brief remarks in relation to certain specific abuses which he alleged existed in the navy pension system.

Mr. PICKENS said he had but a word to say. He thought, on yesterday, that he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts in respect to this law, and thought that he was following his friend from New York, [Mr. MONROE,] who so eloquently spoke of the trust fund being seized upon, which was set aside for specific purposes. He thought he was following these gentlemen for the repeal of the law; for it seemed unjust, and as he conceived, ought to be repealed. Now that act is repealed, (said Mr. P.) we find gentlemen who denounced this law, speaking against its repeal. He could not understand this system of legislation. If there were specific cases of injustice, as stated by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. TILLINGHAST,] let the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs bring in a bill to obviate them, and he would cheerfully vote for it. He believed that, to preserve the navy, we must preserve its honor.

The law, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from New York, was unjust, and Mr. P. was for its repeal. It was by passing such laws that we struck at the honor of the navy, and the House did right in purging the statute book of the unjust law.

In case the House should refuse to reconsider the vote, he hoped the chairman of the Naval Committee would bring in a bill which would cover the whole matter, and do justice to widows and orphans.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, after a review of the origin of the navy pension laws, contended that the law of 1837 ought not to be repealed without proper notice being given to the persons receiving pensions under it. If the House thought proper to adopt a measure of this kind, he thought at least six months' notice ought to be given, as otherwise it would create great inconvenience.

Mr. SHEPARD then took the floor, and was proceeding to vindicate his amendment, when

A message was received from the Senate, by their Secretary, who presented a series of resolutions adopted by that body, announcing the decease of the Hon. FELIX GRUNDY, a Senator from Tennessee, and paying a tribute of respect to his memory.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. A. V. BROWN of Tennessee rose, and in a very impressive manner pronounced the following eulogium:

Mr. SPEAKER: The painful announcement which we have just heard, makes it proper that I should submit to the House the resolutions which I now send to your table.

It is true that the deceased, at the time of his death, was not a member of this House: but he was once a member of it; and the deep and indelible impress of his talents and patriotism, whilst he was here, the lapse of nearly thirty years has not been able to efface. What record in our archives does not tell of his great and invaluable services, in 1812, '13, and '14, when we declared and prosecuted with success "the second war of independence," against the proudest and strongest nation in the world? The bold and thrilling eloquence with which he urged this body to declare that war, and the readiness with which he voted for all the supplies, both of men and money, necessary to its prosecution, identified Mr. GRUNDY with the most illustrious patriots of that eventful period.

Were these his only services, a Nation's gratitude might still challenge at our hands, as well as from the body of which he was a member, some tribute of respect to the memory of one who was, at that period, so wise in council and so eminent in debate.

His public career commenced more than forty years ago, in the convention for revising the Constitution of Kentucky. He was then but twenty-one or two years of age; but exhibited, during the deliberations of that body, unerring evidence of his future usefulness and eminence.

He was afterwards, for six years, a distinguished and useful member of the Legislature of that State; losing nothing, by comparison, with any of those eminent lawyers and statesmen of which Kentucky has always been so prolific.

In 1806, he was elected one of the judges of the Supreme Court of that State, and was soon after appointed its Chief Justice, and discharged its duties with industry, impartiality, and distinguished ability.

In the winter of 1807-'8, he removed to Tennessee, and for several years devoted himself exclusively to the practice of his profession, in which he had but few equals, and certainly no superiors. To say this of any one who came in forensic collision with such men as JOHN DICKENSON, Judge HAYWOOD, JENKIN WHITESIDE, Judge OVERTON, and in later years with Judge CRABB and WILLIAM L. BROWN, is no ordinary praise. In criminal jurisprudence, even these claimed no competition with him; but he stood out in advance of all others, unrivalled as an able, eloquent, and successful advocate.

He served in the Legislature of Tennessee, beginning in 1819, about the same length of time he had done in that of Kentucky—placing on her statute book some of her most valuable laws, and giving to her legislation, by his precepts and example, much of that moral tone and liberality of principle which now distinguishes it.

In 1829, Mr. GRUNDY was elected to the United States Senate, and commenced his labors in that body with the administration of General JACKSON. What his services to the country have been since then, either as a Senator or Attorney General, is too fresh in the recollection of all to need to be repeated on the present occasion. But the future history of this country (when that history can be written unbiassed by the party prejudices of the day) cannot fail to award to Mr. GRUNDY the highest meed of praise, of having been a safe and discreet Counsellor, an eloquent and efficient Senator, and an undoubted Patriot.

The loss of such a man, at any time, must be felt by the nation. At such a moment as the present, when America stands in need of all the talents and all the patriotism of all her most gifted sons, his loss must be deeply felt, and deeply mourned. To his own State, that he so dearly loved, which had honored him so often, and whose recent confidence in him I know he was anxious to repay by the most devoted zeal and fidelity—to Tennessee, his loss must be almost irreparable. But, O God! what must it be to his bereaved family! To her, who has been the wife of his bosom from youth to old age—from the days of his poverty to those of wealth and of fame!—to her, whom we (looking toward Mr. TURNER) so lately saw watching by his side, with such conjugal affection, and such Christian hope!—what to her must be his loss! What to his children! But I forbear: I have no right to conduct you into "this house of mourning," whose agonized inmates must look to no earthly source for consolation in this sad hour of their bereavement and sorrow.

Mr. BROWN then sent to the Chair the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of the Hon. FELIX GRUNDY, late a member of the Senate of the United States,

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

this House will go into mourning, and wear crape for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were adopted; and
The House adjourned.

NOTE.—From the notice of the remarks of Mr. TILLINGHAST, in relation to the navy pensions on Friday, it may be inferred that he was opposed to the existing law of 1837, and for its repeal. Such was not his intention. On the contrary, he opposed the repeal, and spoke against entertaining the section for its repeal as an amendment to the appropriation bill under consideration; considering it both irregular and unjust. He said if there were any specific abuse, as some gentlemen alleged, that could be traced to that law, rather than to other and specific legislation or to misconstruction, still this furnished no ground for a repeal of the whole law in this summary mode, providing no substitute, whereby the bread would instantly, without notice or preparation, be taken from the mouth of the destitute widow and the orphan child of the gallant men whose fund we had taken as trustees, and were bound to administer for the purposes so dear to their hearts. He referred to specific instances of hardship and cruelty, as well as as gross injustice and impolicy, which the repeal would produce, and it was to these that Mr. PICKENS alluded in his reply. He contended for a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had repealed the act of 1837; having personally requested one or two friends, who had voted in the majority to move a reconsideration; and in the beginning and end of his remarks, maintained that the act of 1837 was a portion of a system honorable to the country, and due to the navy, and ought not to be repealed; but if the imperfections or abuses existed, they should be considered in the shape of a separate bill for their correction, which I was led to believe the Committee on Naval Affairs would ere long report.

CHARTER OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. MERRICK submitted a motion directing the Secretary of the Senate to cause the bill to amend and continue in force the acts to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, which was some days since referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia to be published in the daily newspapers of the city. His object in making the motion was to give the citizens who were so much interested in the matter an opportunity of examining the bill, and enable them to suggest such amendments to the committee as they might deem useful or expedient.

After some remarks from Mr. KING, Mr. MERRICK modified his motion, so as to have the bill printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill is in the following words:

A BILL to amend and continue in force the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of the city of Washington shall continue to be a body politic and corporate, by the name of "the Mayor, Board of Aldermen, and Board of Common Council of the city of Washington," to be elected by ballot as hereinafter directed; and by their corporate name, may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, grant, receive, and do all other acts, as natural persons, and may purchase and hold real, personal, and mixed property, or dispose of the same for the benefit of the city; and may have and use a city seal, and break and alter the same at pleasure.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the present boards of aldermen and common council shall, before the last Monday in May next, divide the city into a number of wards not fewer than six, and not exceeding ten, in such manner, and with such manner, and with such bounds and limits, as to secure to each, as near as may be, an equal number of the inhabitants of said city.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That an election shall be held on the first Monday in June next for mayor of the said city, to serve for two years from the Monday next ensuing his election; and that a similar election for said officer shall be held on the first Monday in June in every second year thereafter, at the same time and places designated for holding the elections for the two boards, to serve for the same period, and until a successor shall be chosen. The commissioners hereinafter mentioned, shall make out duplicate certificates of the election of mayor, and shall return one to the board of aldermen, and the other to the board of common council, on the Monday next ensuing the election, and the person having the greatest number of votes shall be mayor. But in case two or more persons, highest in vote, shall have an equal number of votes, then it shall be lawful for the board of aldermen and the board of common council to proceed forthwith, by ballot, in joint meeting, to determine the choice between such persons, and to elect one of the same to be mayor. The mayor shall, on the Monday next ensuing his election, before he enters on the duties of his office, in the presence of the boards of aldermen and common council, take an oath or affirmation, to be administered by a justice of the peace, "lawfully to execute the duties of his office, to the best of his skill and judgment, without favor or partiality." He shall, ex officio, have and exercise all the powers, authority, and jurisdiction of a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, within the said county. He shall nominate, and, with the consent of the board of aldermen, appoint to all offices under the corporation, except commissioners of election, and may remove any such officer from office at his will and pleasure. He shall appoint persons to fill up all vacancies which may occur during the recess of the board of aldermen, to hold such appointments to the end of the then ensuing session. He may convene the two boards when, in his opinion, the public good may require it; and he shall lay before them, from time to time, in writing, such recommendations of measures or alterations in the laws of the corporation as he may deem necessary and proper. He shall receive for his services, annually, a just and reasonable compensation, to be allowed and fixed by the two boards, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during his continuance in office. Any person, who is a free white male citizen of the United States, who shall have attained the age of twenty-five years, and who shall have resided in the city two years immediately preceding his election, shall be eligible to the office of mayor. In case of the refusal of any person to accept the office of mayor upon his election thereto, or of his death, resignation, inability, or removal from the city, the said boards shall assemble and elect another in his place, to serve for the remainder of the term, or during such inability.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the board of aldermen shall be composed of a number of members equal to the number of wards into which the city may be divided, one of whom shall be elected by the qualified voters in each ward, to reside therein at the time of his election, and to serve for two years from the Monday next ensuing his election. The first election for aldermen shall be held on the first Monday in June next, and on the same day in the same month every second year thereafter. The board of common council shall consist of two members from each ward, to be chosen by the qualified voters in each, so reside therein at the time of their election, and to serve for one year from the Monday next ensuing their election. The first election for members of the board of common council shall be held on the first Monday in June next, and on the same day in the same month every year thereafter. Any free white male citizen of the United States, who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, and resided in the city one year immediately preceding his election, shall be eligible to the board of aldermen or the board of common council. A majority of each board shall be necessary to form a quorum to do business, but a less number may adjourn from day to day; they may compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, and allow such compensation for the attendance of the members, as they may by law provide. Each board shall appoint its own president, who shall preside during its sessions, and who shall be entitled to vote on all questions; they shall settle their rules of proceedings, appoint their own officers, regulate their respective compensations, and remove them at pleasure, and may, with the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole, expel any member for disorderly behavior or misconduct in office, but not a second time for the same offence. Each board shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and the yeas and nays shall be entered therein at the request of any member; and their deliberations shall be public. All ordinances or acts, passed by the two boards, shall be sent to the mayor for his approbation, and when approved by him, shall be obligatory as such; but, if the mayor shall not approve of any ordinance or act, so sent to him, he shall return the same within five days, with his reasons therefor in writing; and, if two thirds of both boards, on reconsideration thereof, agree to pass the same, it shall be in force in like manner as if he had approved it; but, if the two boards shall, by their adjournment, prevent its return, the same shall not be obligatory. Each board shall meet at the council chamber on the second Monday in June next, at ten o'clock in the morning, for the despatch of business, and at the same hour on the second Monday in June in every year thereafter; and at such other times as the two boards may, by law, direct.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be elected in and for each ward, by the qualified voters resident therein, on the first Monday in June next, and on the same day in the same month every fourth year thereafter, one justice of the peace, to serve for four years from the Monday next ensuing his election. Any free white male citizen of the United States, who shall have attained the age of twenty-five years, and resided in the city one year immediately preceding his election, shall be eligible to the office of justice of the peace.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That one constable in and for each ward shall be elected by the qualified voters resident therein, on the first Monday in June next, and on the same day in the same month every year thereafter, to serve for one year from the Monday ensuing his election. Any free white male citizen of the United States, who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, and resided in the city one year immediately preceding his election, shall be eligible to the office of constable. In case of the resignation, inability, death, or removal from the city, of any justice of the peace or constable, during the term for which he may be elected, the vacancy shall be filled by a new election in the ward in which such vacancy may occur, to be held within ten days from the time of its occurrence.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That every free white male citizen of the United States, who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, and shall have resided in the city of Washington one year immediately preceding the election, shall be entitled to vote for mayor, members of the board of aldermen, and common council, justices of the peace, and constables, and for every other officer authorized to be chosen at any popular election under this charter. The declaration of one credible witness, under oath or affirmation, as to the citizenship or residence required as aforesaid, shall, in any case where objection is made to the reception of a vote, be deemed and taken to be sufficient proof to entitle any citizen to vote at elections.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all elections shall be held under the superintendence of three commissioners in each ward, to be appointed by the two boards, in joint meeting, at least ten days previous to the day of each election; and it shall be the duty of the commissioners, so appointed, to give at least five days' previous notice of the place in each ward where such elections are to be held. The said commissioners shall, before they receive any ballot, severally take an oath or affirmation, to be administered by some justice of the peace for the county of Washington, "truly and faithfully to receive and return the votes of such persons as are by law entitled to vote for mayor, members of the board of aldermen and board of common council, justice of the peace and constables, in their respective wards, according to the best of their judgment and understanding, and not knowingly to receive or return the vote of any person who is not legally entitled to the same." In all elections, under this act, the polls shall be opened at nine o'clock in the morning, and be closed at seven o'clock in the evening of the same day. Immediately on closing the polls, and before they separate, the said commissioners for each ward, or a majority of them, shall count the ballots, and make out, under their hands and seals, a correct return of the persons having the greatest number of legal votes, respectively, together with the number of votes given to each person voted for; and the person having the greatest number of votes, respectively, shall be duly elected; and, in all cases of an equality of votes, the commissioners shall decide the choice by lots. The said returns shall be delivered to the mayor on the day succeeding the election, who shall cause the result of the election to be published in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington. A duplicate return shall, together with a list of the persons who voted at such election, also be made, on the day succeeding the election, to the register of the city, who shall preserve and record the same; and shall, within two days thereafter, notify the several persons, so returned, of their election. And each board shall judge of the legality of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members, and shall supply vacancies in its own body, by causing elections to be held to fill the same, and appoint commissioners to hold the same; and such commissioners shall give, at least, five days' previous public notice of the time and place of holding public elections. Each of the members of either board shall, before entering on the duties of his office, take an oath or affirmation "faithfully to execute the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and ability," which oath or affirmation shall be administered by the mayor or some justice for the peace of the county of Washington. The said commissioners shall, also, make out duplicate returns of the persons receiving the highest number of votes for justices of the peace and constables, and transmit the same to the mayor, by whom they shall respectively be commissioned. In case of an equal number of votes for any two or more candidates for justices or constables, the commissioners shall decide the choice by lots. In case of the death, resignation, or inability to serve, of any commissioner of election, it shall be lawful for the mayor to make an appointment, in writing, to fill such vacancy, which appointment shall be returned to the register, with the return of such election. And in case the two boards shall neglect to appoint commissioners to hold the election in any ward, the electors present at the place of holding the election in such ward at the time when such election should commence, to the number of ten or more, may proceed, viva voce, to elect three commissioners to hold such election, who shall be sworn and proceed in all respects as if they had been appointed by the two boards aforesaid.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the corporation aforesaid shall have full power and authority to lay and collect a poll-tax upon every free white male citizen of the age of twenty-one years or upward, not exceeding one dollar per annum; and to lay and collect taxes upon the real and personal property within the said city: Provided, That no tax shall be laid upon real property at a higher rate than three quarters of one per centum on the assessment valuation thereof, except for the special purposes hereinafter provided; and that no tax shall be laid upon the wearing apparel, or necessary tools and implements used in carrying on the trade or occupation of any person, nor shall the same be subject to distress and sale for any tax; and, after providing for all objects of a general nature, the taxes raised on the assessable property in each ward shall be expended therein, and in no other, to establish a board of health, with competent authority to enforce its regulations, and to establish such other regulations as may be necessary to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, and for the preservation of the health of the city; to prevent and remove nuisances; to establish night watches or patrols, and erect lamps in the streets; to preserve the navigation of the Potomac and Anacostia rivers adjoining the city; to erect, repair, and regulate public wharves, and to deepen creeks, docks, and basins; to regulate the manner of erecting, and the rates of wharfage at private wharves; to regulate the stationing, anchorage, and mooring of vessels; to provide for licensing, taxing, and regulating auctions, retailers, ordinaries, and taverns, hackney carriages, wagons, carts, and drays, pawnbrokers, vendors of lottery tickets, money changers, and hawkers, and pedlars; to provide for licensing, taxing, regulating, or restraining theatrical or public shows and amusements, to restrain or prohibit tippling-houses, lotteries, and all kinds of gaming; to regulate and establish marks; to erect and repair bridges; to open and keep in repair streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, drains, and sewers, agreeably to the plan of the city; to supply the city with water; to provide for the safekeeping of the standard weights and measures as fixed by Congress, and for the regulation of all weights and measures used in the city; to regulate the sweeping of chimneys, and to fix the rates or fees therefor; to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires; to regulate the size of bricks to be made or used, and provide for the inspection of lumber and other building materials to be sold in the city; to regulate, with the approbation of the President of the United States, the manner of erecting and the materials to be used in the erection of houses; to regulate the inspection of tobacco, flour, butter, and lard, in casks or boxes, and salted provision; to regulate the gauging of casks and liquors, the storage of gunpowder, and all naval and military stores not the property of the United States, and the weight and quality of bread; to impose and appropriate fines, penalties, and forfeitures, for the breach of their laws or ordinances; and to provide for the appointment of inspectors, constables, and such other officers as may be necessary to execute the laws of the corporation.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall have full power and authority to lay taxes on particular wards, parts, or sections of the city, for their particular local improvements; and, upon application of the owners of more than one-half of the property upon any portion of a street, to cause the curb stones to be set, and the footways to be paved, on such portion of a street, and to lay a tax on such property to the amount of the expense thereof: Provided, That such tax shall not exceed three dollars per front foot; and, upon a like application, to cause the carriage way of any portion of a street to be paved, or lamps to be erected thereon, and light the same, and lay a tax not exceeding the whole expense thereof, in due proportion, on the lots fronting on such portion of a street; and also to impose an addition or interest on the amounts of any such taxes, not exceeding ten per centum per annum, when the same shall not have been paid within thirty days after the same shall have become due. The said corporation shall also have power and authority to provide for the establishment and superintendence of public schools, and to endow the same; to establish and erect hospitals or pest-houses, watch and work houses, houses of correction, penitentiary, and other public buildings, and to lay and collect taxes for the expenses thereof; to regulate party or other walls and fences, and to determine by whom the same shall be kept in repair; to cause new alleys to be opened through the squares, and to extend those already laid out, upon the application of the owners of more than one-half the property in each square: Provided, That the damages which may accrue thereby to any individual or individuals shall be first ascertained by a jury, to be summoned and empanelled by the marshal of the District of Columbia (and it is hereby made his duty to summon and empanel the same, in all such cases, upon application to him, in writing, by the mayor of the city,) and such damages to be paid by the corporation; the amount thereof, and the expenses accruing, shall be levied in due proportion upon the individuals whose property on such square shall be benefited thereby, and collected as other taxes are; to occupy and improve for public purposes, by and with the consent of the President of the United States, any part of the public and open spaces and squares in said city, not interfering with any private rights; to regulate the admeasurement and weight by which all articles brought into the city for sale shall be disposed of; to provide for the appointment of appraisers and measurers of builders' work and materials, and also of wood, coal, grain, and lumber; to restrain and prohibit the nightly and other disorderly meetings of slaves, free negroes and mulattoes, by imprisonment, not exceeding six months for any one offence; and to punish such slaves by whipping, not exceeding forty stripes, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months for any one offence; and to punish free negroes and mulattoes, by penalties not exceeding twenty dollars for any one offence; and in case of inability of any such free negro or mulatto to pay any such penalty and cost therein, to cause him, or her, to be confined to labor for any time not exceeding six calendar months; to cause all vagrants, idlers, or disorderly persons, all persons of evil life or ill fame, and all such as have no visible means of support, or are likely to become chargeable to the corporation as paupers, or are found begging or drunk in or about the street, or loitering in or about tippling-houses, or who can show no reasonable cause of business or employment in the city, and all suspicious persons who have no fixed place of residence, or who cannot give a good account of themselves, all eaves-droppers and night-walkers, all who shall be guilty of open profanity or grossly indecent language or behavior publicly in the streets, all public prostitutes and such as lead a notoriously lewd or lascivious course of life, and all such as keep public gaming-tables or gaming-houses, to give security for their good behavior, and to indemnify the city against any charge for their support; and in case of their refusal or inability to give such security, to cause them to be confined to labor until such security shall be given, not exceeding however one year at a time; but if they shall be found again offending, the like proceedings may be again had; and from time to time, so often as may be necessary to enforce the departure of such vagrants and paupers as may come into the city to reside, unless they shall give ample security that they will not become chargeable on the corporation for their support; to provide for the binding out, as apprentices, of poor orphan children, and the children of drunkards, vagrants, and paupers; to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which free negroes and mulattoes may reside in the city; to take care of, and regulate, burial grounds; to provide for the registering of births, deaths, and marriages; to punish

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the marshal of the District of Columbia shall receive and safely keep within the jail for the county of Washington, at the expense of the said corporation, all persons committed thereto, under or by authority of the provisions of this act. And in all cases when suit shall be brought before a justice of the peace, for the recovery of any fine or penalty arising or incurred for a breach of any law or ordinance of the corporation, execution shall and may be issued as in all other cases of small debts.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That real property, whether improved or unimproved, in the city of Washington, on which two or more years' taxes shall have remained due and unpaid, or on which any special tax, imposed by virtue of authority of the provisions of this act, shall have remained unpaid for two or more years after the same shall have become due, or so much thereof, not less than a lot, (when the property upon which the tax has accrued is not less than that quantity,) as may be necessary to pay any such taxes, with all legal costs and charges arising thereon, may be sold at public sale to satisfy the corporation therefor: Provided, That public notice of the time and place of the sale of all real property, for taxes due the corporation of the city of Washington, shall be given in all cases hereafter, by advertisement inserted in some newspaper published in said city, once in each week, for at least twelve successive weeks, in which advertisements shall be stated the number of the square or squares, the number of the lot or lots, (if the square has been divided into lots,) the name or names of the person or persons to whom the same may be assessed on the books of the corporation at the time of such advertisement, the amount of the tax due on each square or lot, the period for which the same shall be due, and the aggregate amount of taxes due on all real property assessed, in the name of the same person or persons; but when a whole square is assessed to the same person or persons, though divided into lots, it may be assessed and advertised as if the same was not divided. And no sale of real property for taxes hereafter made, shall be impaired or void by reason of such property not being assessed or advertised in the name or names of the lawful owner or owners thereof: Provided, The same shall be advertised as above directed, or by reason of the amount of taxes due thereon not being correctly stated. The purchaser or purchasers of any such property shall pay, at the time of such sale, the amount of the taxes due on the property so purchased by him, her, or them, respectively, with the amount of the expenses of sale; and he, she, or they, shall pay the residue of the purchase money, within ten days after the expiration of two years from the day of sale, to the collector of taxes, or other officer of the corporation authorized to receive the same; and the amount of said residue shall be placed in the city treasury, where it shall remain, subject to the order of the original proprietor or proprietors, his, her, or their legal representative; and the purchaser or purchasers shall receive a title in fee simple, in and to the lot or lots so sold and purchased, under the hand of the mayor and the seal of the corporation, which shall be deemed good and valid in law and equity: Provided, nevertheless, That if, within two years from the day of any such sale, or before such purchaser or purchasers shall have paid the residue of the purchase money, as aforesaid, the proprietor or proprietors of any property which shall have been sold as aforesaid, his, her, or their heirs, agents, or legal representatives, shall repay to such purchaser or purchasers the moneys paid for the taxes and expenses as aforesaid, together with the per centum per annum, as interest thereon, or make a tender thereof, or shall deposit the same in the hands of the mayor of the city, or other officer of the corporation appointed to receive the same, for the use of such purchaser or purchasers, and subject to the order of his, her, or their heirs or legal representatives, of which such purchaser or purchasers, his, her, or their heirs or legal representatives, shall be immediately informed, by notice in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington, or otherwise, he, she, or they, shall be reinstated in his, her, or their original right and title, as if no such sale had been made. And if any such purchaser shall fail to pay the residue of the purchase money, as aforesaid, within the time required by this section, for any property so purchased by him, he shall pay ten per centum for annum as interest thereon, and in addition to such residue, to be computed from the expiration of the two years, as aforesaid, until the actual payment of such residue, and the receiving of a conveyance from the corporation; and the said interest shall alike be subject to the order of the original proprietor or proprietors, as the residue of the purchase money, as aforesaid: Provided, also, That no sales shall be made, in pursuance of this section, of any improved real property, where there is personal property of sufficient value to pay the said taxes; and that minors, mortgagees, or others, having equitable or real property, which property shall be sold for taxes, as aforesaid, shall be allowed one year after such minors coming to, or being of, full age, or after such mortgagees and others, having equitable interests, obtaining possession of, or a decree for, the sale of such property, to redeem the property so sold from the purchaser or purchasers, his, her, or their assignees, or paying the amount of purchase money so paid therefor, with ten per centum interest thereon, as aforesaid, and all the taxes that have been paid thereon by the purchaser, or his assigns, between the day of sale and the period of such redemption, with the ten per centum interest on the amount of such taxes, and also the full value of the improvements which may have been made or erected on such property, by the purchaser, or his assigns, while the same was in his, her, or their possession: And provided, moreover, That where the estate of the tenant in default, as for years or for life or lives, shall be sufficient to defray the taxes chargeable thereupon, such estate only shall be liable to be sold under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the collector or other officer (duly authorized) to postpone, after such advertisement, the sale of any property advertised according to the provisions of the foregoing section, to any future day, for the want of bidders, he giving public notice of such postponement, and the sale made at such postponed time shall be equally valid as if made on the day stated in the advertisement.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the person or persons appointed to collect any tax imposed by virtue of the powers granted by this act, shall have authority to collect the same by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the persons chargeable therewith; but no such sale shall be made unless ten days' previous notice thereof be given in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington. And the provisions of the acts of assembly of Maryland now in force in the county of Washington, relating to the right of replevying personal property taken in execution for public taxes, shall apply to all cases of personal property taken by distress to satisfy taxes imposed by virtue of this act.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of sales of real property for taxes due the said corporation, when such sale shall not have been made according to law and void, it shall be lawful for the said corporation on the application of the purchaser or other person entitled under him, to refund and pay to such person or persons the amount paid by him or them, on account of such purchase, and also the subsequent taxes accrued and paid on the said property, and to re-assess the amount of taxes so refunded on the property on which the same shall have accrued, which shall be collected in the manner as provided by law for the collection of other taxes, at any time after the first day of January next, after the same shall be so re-assessed.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said corporation where there shall be a number of lots assessed to the same person or persons, to sell one or more of such lots for the taxes and expenses due on the whole; and also to provide for the sale of any part of a lot for the taxes and expenses due on the said lot or other lots assessed to the same person as may appear expedient, according to such rules and regulations as the said corporation may prescribe.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, shall not possess the power of assessing any tax on property in the city of Washington; nor shall the corporation of the said city be obliged to contribute in any manner toward the expenses or expenditures of said court, except for the one half part of the expenses incurred on account of the orphans' court, the office of the coroner, the jail of the said county, and the opening and repairing of roads in the county of Washington, east of Rock creek, leading directly to the city of Washington, but the said corporation shall have the sole control and management of the bridge over Rock creek at the termination of K street north; and shall be chargeable with the expense of keeping the same in repair and rebuilding it when necessary.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of the circuit court and the register of wills for the county of Washington, respectively, shall furnish the register of the city or other officer of the corporation appointed to receive the same, on or about the first Monday in January and July in every year, correct lists of the transfers of real property in the city during the next preceding half year, so far as can be ascertained by the records in their respective offices; and the said corporation shall make to the said clerk and register of wills such compensation therefor as shall be agreed on between the respective parties, not exceeding six cents for each transfer on such lists.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, or other person appointed to superintend the United States disbursements in the city of Washington, shall reimburse to the said corporation a just proportion of any expense which may hereafter be incurred in laying open, paving, or otherwise improving any of the streets or avenues in front of, or adjoining to, or which may pass through or between any of the public squares or reservations, which proportion shall be determined by a comparison of the length of the front or fronts of the said squares or reservations of the United States on any such street or avenue, with the whole extent of the two sides thereof; and he shall cause the curb stones to be set, and footways to be paved, on the side or sides of any such street or avenue whenever the said corporation shall, by law, direct such improvements to be made by the proprietors of the lots on the opposite side of any such street or avenue, or adjacent to any such square or reservation; and he shall cause the footways to be paved, and the curb stones to be set, in front of any lot or lots belonging to the United States, when the like improvements shall be ordered by the corporation in front of the lots adjoining, or squares adjacent thereto; and he shall defray the expenses directed by this section out of any moneys arising from the sale of lots in the city of Washington belonging to the United States, and from no other fund.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the mayor, the members of the board of aldermen, and the members of the board of common council, and the other officers of the corporation, in office at this time, shall and may continue as such until the second Monday in June next.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the corporation of the city of Washington shall not have power to contract any debt for which the property of the citizens shall be mortgaged or held in lien, or the public property pledged for the payment of the same, without a previous sanction thereof by the votes of two-thirds of the legalized voters of the city of Washington, to be ascertained by an advertised poll, by ballot, to be held at the usual places of holding elections for city officers.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That the corporation shall have no power to issue, or authorize to be issued, any bills of credit, or promissory notes, which shall pass as a currency in the District of Columbia or elsewhere.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force for and during the term of ten years, and no longer; but Congress may, at any time, alter, modify, amend, or repeal, the same. BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS.

The bill to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, coming up on its third reading—

Mr. CALHOUN said he did not rise to oppose this bill, though, as he understood it, it was one of the most pernicious acts ever passed; he had expressed his view of its character on former occasions, and he would now content himself with asking that the question upon it be taken by the yeas and noes.

The yeas and noes having been ordered,
Mr. HENDERSON concurred with the Senator from South Carolina that this was a pernicious bill, and he expressed his intention to vote against it.

Mr. MANGUM said, bad as was the bill in itself, it also involved a profound change in the practice on private claims; and as there were some Senators who were not on the floor during the discussions on this subject at previous sessions, he asked the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] to permit this bill to lie on the table, to give the new Senators an opportunity to become acquainted with it. The subject was an important one; it involved a principle which profoundly affected the rights of the Government and the rights of individuals; and though it had been much discussed at previous sessions, for the reason he had given, he hoped, for the present, it would be laid on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD was about to make the same motion when the Senator from South Carolina rose, who had uniformly been opposed to it from the commencement. The Senator from South Carolina viewed it in a different light than he [Mr. HUBBARD] did, and that opinion he [Mr. CALHOUN] had expressed heretofore, as he had done this day; but his [Mr. HUBBARD's] opinion was, that if it should pass, as it had done at the two last sessions, it would be found in its operation to be a great saving to the Government, and also to the honest claimant, and that it would be found to be opposed to those claims which had no right in themselves to be granted. He was aware of the necessity for some general legislation of this kind, and he was sure that if the Senator from South Carolina had served as a member of the committee with him, (Mr. HUBBARD,) he would have come to a different conclusion than he had done. Being desirous that it should lie on the table until it could be examined by the new Senators, and its object ascertained, he would renew the motion to effect that object.

Mr. HUNTINGTON also desired that it should be laid on the table, as he was desirous to examine the bill.

Mr. LINN said this bill had passed at the last three or four sessions, if he recollected right, when it was fully discussed, besides being four times reported on—twice by the Committee on Claims, and twice by the Judiciary Committee; he was therefore surprised to find the gentleman [Mr. CALHOUN] objecting to it again, as he had done year after year, and especially as that honorable Senator had not offered any measure as a substitute. He (Mr. LINN) would vote for any measure that would do more justice to the private claimant, for no system could, by any possibility, be worse than the present. Of this he was convinced by their legislation; and he regretted that honorable Senators had not seen the distress of the widows and children of land claimants, occasioned by the delay in the disposal of their claims; for he was sure, if they had, they would give to this subject that disposal which would lead to a speedier determination of private claims, while a due regard was not only paid to the rights of the citizen, but to the nation at large. He was understood to say that from 1,500 to 2,000 bills of this description were reported in the House of Representatives during the last session; and he had himself reported a bill six years ago, which had not been acted on yet. He did not charge neglect of duty on any one; but he was satisfied that, in the first place, this body was too large and too transient, and in the next place, that it was too political. The questions involved in these claims were sometimes of an abstruse character, and it required time to acquire such a knowledge of and acquaintance with them as was necessary; but how often did it follow, that, when this knowledge was obtained, Senators, who held the doctrine of the right of instruction, resigned their seats, and others came in who had to pursue the same course of inquiry? For his part, his profession, as well as his habits of thought, led him to look at and regard individual suffering; but the other side appeared to act like the soldier on the field of battle, who treads on friends or foes in the pursuit of his object. The Senator from South Carolina might pursue his course of opposition; he (Mr. LINN) should pursue a different course.

Mr. CALHOUN had no intention to debate this question when he called for the yeas and noes; and he submitted to gentlemen opposite, whether it was proper that this bill should be laid on the table, after a debate on one side only. If gentlemen were desirous of a discussion, he (Mr. CALHOUN) was prepared to go into it. He was convinced that the system proposed by this bill was not only worse than the existing system, but infinitely worse—that it was the worst that could be devised. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] had expressed his surprise that he (Mr. CALHOUN) had proposed nothing as a substitute. Now, had he not again and again made propositions in that chamber, and had not the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] proposed that this body should adopt some such rule as was adopted by all judicial bodies, to regulate cases of this description, and to put a limitation to the application? But, to show the evil of the existing system, the claims might be decided a hundred times, and yet they might be renewed from time to time. Now there ought not to be this perpetual renewal of these claims; but a claim twice presented and twice rejected should not have another hearing, unless on the allegation of new testimony that was believed to be important to the case. He had made propositions on other occasions to remedy these evils, and to facilitate the disposal of the increasing business from the new States, which would have diminished the private business at least one-third, if the proposition had been adopted. Now, without going into the merits of the present bill, he desired to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it proposed to create two commissioners, with power vastly superior to that held by the Judges of the Supreme Court—two men who, though members of Congress were not to be permitted to be solicitors before them, yet, as the board would be held here in Washington, and as the commissioners were to be removable by the Executive at any moment, an improper influence might be brought to bear upon them, and they would not be independent men. Again; there was no proposed limitation of the cases of which they were to dispose. Now such a tribunal never was known in this or any other country. If it decided against the United States, its decision was final; but if against the claimant, the door remained open to petition again and again, and the result would be that the claims would be renewed perpetually, as they had been hitherto. They would have, too, the claims for the five millions of French spoliation of forty years' standing, if there were no limitation to the powers of these commissioners; and, therefore, he was opposed to this bill on principle; he was opposed to it on the principle of expediency; he was opposed to it in every view in which it could be presented. But he did not now wish to go into a discussion of the bill; he was disposed to let it go without remark, but he could not consent to do so if gentlemen rose there, one after another, to make speeches for the purpose of forestalling public opinion.

Mr. HUBBARD was disposed, too, to let the bill go, for he had heard precisely the same arguments urged the last three years that were urged by the Senator from South Carolina; notwithstanding which, the bill had received the favorable action of several past sessions. He was very willing that every Senator should have an opportunity to examine the subject; and if no other gentleman desired to make further remarks, he would again move that this bill be laid on the table.

Mr. LINN did not recollect any such proposition of the Senator from South Carolina for a better system; and he then discussed some of the details of the existing practice, and again expressed his opinion that this body was too political for the proper disposal of the business arising out of these private claims. When the Treasury was full, there was felt to be less obstruction than when the fountain was dried up, when there appeared to be not only an unwillingness to examine them, but a desire to let them go over to the next session, or to some future time. He was not sure that he was in order in making these remarks; and therefore, he would not longer continue the discussion.

Mr. CALHOUN repeated that he had contemplated a general rule by which no petition, after two rejections, could be in order.

Mr. MANGUM did not wish to be understood, by asking for time, as having a preconcerted opinion against this bill. He desired to look into this measure, because it proposed a great and profound change—a change which, unless it were well guarded, would be productive of great mischief. He desired now to vary his motion from that which he made when first up—he wished the postponement of the bill to a day certain; and he named Monday week as that day.

Mr. SEVIER said this was a bill to which he had given his strenuous opposition on other occasions, and to which he was still opposed. He wished to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that this bill proposed the establishment of a board of commissioners to supersede the purposes of this Government in the disposal of claims, no matter what they might be, whether for Indian depredations, land claims, or otherwise. If this board were established, it would alone have cognizance of claims against the Government, and it would then be a useless expense to have a Congress at all, beyond the mere necessity of meeting to make such appropriations as were necessary for the liquidation of the claims which these commissioners might decide against the United States. He hoped those Senators who had come fresh from the people, would join the opponents of this bill, who on previous occasions were sixteen in number. If it were passed, they would adopt a measure which overthrew much of the legitimate power and jurisdiction of Congress, and gave it to two commissioners, with an extension of power not only over this country, but to Europe, and Asia, and Africa, to procure testimony. The expense of this procedure would be of great magnitude, and after all, the honorable Senator told them they had the power to revise the commissioners' proceedings! But if they were ultimately to come to this body, a committee would still be necessary to examine the testimony in the several cases, for he supposed the Senate would not be disposed to take it in the rough; and, therefore, he hoped a bill would not be passed to appoint commissioners to do that which a committee must do over again. If some gentlemen would take up less time with their speeches about log cabins and other things of as little value, the Senate would be able to dispose of more real business, and this or any other board would be unnecessary.

Mr. LINN rose amidst cries of "Question," "Question;" and after a few words of remonstrance against a long postponement of the bill as calculated to delay it to the end of the session, when it would share the fate which it had met on other occasions, he suggested to the Senate the propriety of allowing the bill to pass informally.

After a few words from Mr. MANGUM, the bill was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. TAPPAN, the bill to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected by her for that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes, was taken up.

Mr. TAPPAN opposed the passage of this bill. He said that in the first section of this bill, it was proposed to enact: "That there be, and there hereby is, confirmed to the State of Indiana, the land selected by her, under the provisions of the act of second of March, eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, entitled, 'An act to grant a certain quantity of land to the State of Indiana, for the purpose of aiding the State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Wabash with those of Lake Erie,' for that portion of the canal between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, as returned by said State to the Secretary of the Treasury." This was in fact a proposition to grant to the State of Indiana 144,000 acres of land; but to this he did not rise to object, if the grant were made specifically to aid the construction of a canal between the points mentioned; but he objected to the passage of this bill in the form in which it was presented. He then proceeded to review the grounds on which this bill was urged upon the attention of Congress, and the history of legislation respecting this canal. He said, during the last session of Congress they had a report presented to the Senate from the Committee on Roads and Canals, which placed this claim on the ground of a similar grant having been made to the State of Ohio to complete the canal from the boundary line of Indiana to Lake Erie. Now the facts were these: the law of 1827 granted land to aid the State of Indiana to open a canal to connect the waters of the Wabash with those of Lake Erie; after the passage of that law, the State of Indiana—by a law passed on the 23d of January, 1829—located her canal to the mouth of the Tippecanoe river; and the land was surveyed and selected, and the grant was confirmed to the foot of the Maumee rapids. The law of 1827 granted to the State of Indiana the land that was necessary for the construction of the canal within the State of Ohio—that is, from the Indiana line to Lake Erie; but for some reason the State of Indiana proposed, in 1834, to cede to the State of Ohio the whole of the land lying within that State, on the condition that the State of Ohio would make that part of the canal within her boundaries. This proposition was acceded to by the State of Ohio, but in this agreement it was expressly stipulated, that the State of Ohio was not to be bound by any location contemplated within that State for the proposed canal; but was to be at liberty to make her own location throughout. Ohio accepted the cession on those terms; but there arose a dispute between the State of Ohio and the Territory of Michigan respecting the boundary line between them; and while that dispute continued, the State of Ohio delayed the construction of the canal within that State. She made no location for the canal until the 8th of April, 1836, when the location was made from the line of Indiana to Maumee Bay. An application was accordingly made to Congress for the land selected, and Congress made the grant as desired; but now the State of Indiana came in and claimed the right to make an extension of her canal, ninety miles, from the mouth of the Tippecanoe river, and asked for a grant of two hundred and forty thousand acres of land for that purpose, which was double the quantity originally set down, and the making of a new location from the mouth of Tippecanoe river to Terre Haute; and this was claimed under the law of 1827, which was entirely complied with on the completion of the agreement with the State of Ohio. Now, as he had before intimated, he had no objection to grant to the State of Indiana this quantity of land, but he contended that the grant ought not to be made under the law of 1827, when all the rights and privileges granted by that law had been received and enjoyed by her. It might be said, and he presumed it would be said, by the Senator from Indiana, that that State had the right to locate her canal to navigable water; and so she had; and she did so when she located the canal to the mouth of the Tippecanoe river, at that point of the Wabash. Now, assuming these to be the facts, he thought it would be better to make a distinct grant to the State of Indiana, to aid her in this proposed canal extension; and he therefore moved that this bill be referred back to the Committee on Roads and Canals, with instructions to report a grant of the requisite land for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana defended the bill at great length, and read to the Senate the report which he made during the last session, as the Chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, in which the facts on which he relied were embodied in a compact form.

Mr. TAPPAN rose to reply, but yielded to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 30, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to introduce the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the investment in the stocks of the several States of this Union of funds held by the Government of the United States, in trust, is, to the amount of the sums so invested and of the interest thereon, an assumption by the United States of the debts of the said several States, in the event of their failure punctually to pay the same.

2. Resolved, That the purchase, by authority of any Executive Department of the Government of the United States, of the bonds of any of the States of this Union, at their nominal value or with a premium thereon, and the subsequent sale of the same bonds at a discount, is an unwarrantable and wasteful dilapidation of public funds.

3. Resolved, That it is the duty of the Executive Government of the United States to require of the Government of each and every State of this Union in whose stocks investments of the public moneys held in trust by the Government of the United States have been made, punctual payment, in specie or its equivalent, of the interest stipulated in the said stocks, and repayment of the principal, as soon as possible by the terms of the contracts upon which such stocks have severally been issued.

4. Resolved, That the further investment of any public funds of the United States in stocks of the several States ought forthwith to be prohibited by law; and that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill for that purpose.

Objection being made, they were not received.

Mr. ADAMS then asked that the resolutions might be printed for the information of the House; which was agreed to.

The next business in order was the motion of

Mr. GIDDINGS to reconsider the vote by which, on Monday, the House had passed the bill making appropriation for the payment of with an amendment repealing the act of 1837.

Mr. SHEPARD, the mover of the amendment, being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday in vindication thereof, and in reply to the various objections which had been urged against it.

Mr. S. said he was aware that the position he had assumed was unpopular, and that any endeavor to lop off abuses of this Government would always excite the hostility of those who received its benefit, and also the opposition of those who think that the strength of the Government, her peculiar interests, and classes depended upon it. Your have (said Mr. S.) done me the honor, Mr. Speaker, to place me upon the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I must either do what is right, or be faithless to my trust. I shall not hesitate to pursue the former.

Mr. S. was not surprised that a motion had been made on yesterday to reconsider the vote by which the amendment which he had offered had been adopted, and, after giving the reasons of gentlemen for supporting such a motion, he stated that the true question before the House was, whether the act of 1837 was right or wrong—whether they were called upon to repeal it or not; and, if gentlemen would give their attention, he would state his opinion upon the subject. In 1800 the navy was in its infancy, or, rather, there was no navy at all. Congress passed the act of that year, to encourage persons to enter the service, and offered to them the highest rewards of human ambition. The act provided that "the money accruing from the sale of prizes, shall be, and remain forever, a fund for the payment of pensions and half-pay, should the same be hereafter granted, to the officers, seamen, and marines, who may be entitled to receive the same" and "every officer, seaman, or marine, disabled in the line of his duty, shall be entitled to receive, for life, or during disability, a pension."

This was the origin of the pension fund, and he asked gentlemen to consider upon it. The fund was to be given to such officers, seamen, and marines, who were disabled in the cause of their country, and Congress had pledged its faith to preserve it. But Congress had violated the most solemn engagements in regard to it.

The act of 1837 specified that pensions should be given to widows and children of those who died in the service. Now this act was entirely different from others on the subject. It provided, not for those who had gallantly fought and died for their country, but for those who had died. A man might have been a drunkard, a drone; but if he died, his wife and children would be benefited by this act. Mr. S. contended that the act of 1837 was a violation of the faith of the Government, and those who passed the act acted in violation of their duty.

Mr. S. asked the House to go to the merits of the act of 1837. They all knew how many warrants had been obtained by persons for the army and navy. A young man, said Mr. S. receives his commission, visits foreign countries, and draws his compensation. He remains in the service but a short time before he cries for pay! pay! pay! He remains in the navy ten or fifteen years, and does nothing to merit the gratitude of the country, perhaps because there has been nothing to do. He dies, and his widow and children receive the money of the Government.

Mr. S. would take another case, which was told to him yesterday. An old soldier, by hard usage and dissipation, has destroyed his constitution. He enters the navy, and in a year or two dies. Under the act of 1837, the widow and children of this old hulk receive from this Government pensions. He had not rendered service to the country; and by granting a pension in such cases, rank injustice was done to the men who took prizes during the war; and this is the act for which we have heard lamentations in this House.

Previous to the act of 1837, the navy pension fund amounted to $1,100,000, and the interest on it was more than sufficient to meet the demands upon it before the 3d of March of that year. The passage of this act increased the pensions to $48,000 annually; but its retrospective bearing not only consumed the interest, but swallowed up the additional sum of $329,000! Can any man wonder, then, that the navy pension fund is gone?

As to the purchase and sale of stocks upon which the gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] had commented with severity, what better could have been done? At the time the money was invested, stocks were above par; and if the Secretary had not so invested the money, there would have been great complaint about discrediting the States.

What is the true rule on this subject? (asked Mr. S.) Gentlemen shall not have the vantage ground of me, by saying that they are the friends of the navy. I am a friend of the navy, sir, and a discreet one, I hope. The true rule on this subject was laid down in the act of 1800—that those who had suffered in the service of their country should be remunerated for it. The act of 1800 made a distinction between the brave and the cowardly—the act of 1837 destroyed it.

Mr. S. noticed another objection which had been made by several gentlemen. They had said that the widows and orphans had received pensions under the act of 1837; and one gentleman had made a piteous appeal, and said that, as the children had been sent to school, the widows expected the pension. The amount of such an argument is this—they had received annually, for four years, $48,000 for their back pensions. They had received this much, which they ought not to have received; and now we are told that, because we have given for four years, they ought now to receive the money! The money belonged to gallant tars, and now we are asked to convey it—to give it away. Was that a sensible argument?

Whenever an assault is made on the Treasury laws, (said Mr. S.) there is always an excuse for it. It is wrong to suffer harpies to prey upon the Treasury; it is all wrong! It is the principle against which I contend. What do we see? Rome went to war, and robbed the neighboring nations of their land. Those who fought the battles—the plebians—thought they were entitled to an equal portion of the land, when the haughty patricians denounced them as agrarians. How is it in England? All the emoluments of Government go to particular individuals, and those who oppose such a state of things are called mobocrats. On one hand, in this country, there are banking institutions, and, on another, domestic industry, to be protected. If connected with the army or navy, the principle is all the same, as far as the public crib was concerned. Let every man depend on his own exertions and his own industry.

Mr. S. said he had now finished what he had intended to say. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had used the word dishonorable in connection with this matter. Mr. S. understood him to say that the House had acted dishonorably in adopting his amendment; but a friend had suggested that he had applied the epithet to him.

Mr. ADAMS said he had made no such application of the term.

Mr. SHEPARD said he would be the last man in this House to speak harshly of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He had heard many things fall from him which excited his feelings. He knew his power, his wit, and far-reaching points. He wished the honorable gentleman would be more charitable. In the angry contests which occur on this floor, Mr. A. could throw oil on the waters of strife. When States are arrayed against each other—when gentlemen are mad, and know not what they do—that gentlemen could seize the opportunity of coming in as a mediator—as a link between Washington and the present generation.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON then took the floor.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS requested that the gentleman from South Carolina would yield the floor a moment, that a letter on the subject before us might be read. He then sent to the Clerk's table the following letter from the Secretary of the Navy:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
December 28, 1840.

Sir: In reply to your inquiry of this morning, I have the honor to inform you that the stock of the city of Cincinnati, lately belonging to the navy pension fund, was sold according to advertisement on the 15th instant, the sale being indispensably necessary to enable the Department to meet, in part, the payment of pensions falling due on the 1st January next.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J. K. PAULDING.

Hon. FRANCIS THOMAS,
Chairman of Naval Committee, House of Reps.
Mr. THOMAS said that it would be proper for him further to say, that this letter was not submitted in the expectation that it would induce the House to reconsider the vote under discussion. It would be seen, by referring to the communication from the Navy Department dated the 1st of December, and sent to Congress by the President, that there were at this time, in stocks owned by the navy pension fund, $158,739; of these stocks, $100,000 were of city of Cincinnati 5 per cent. This last named stock was then advertised to be sold at auction, on the 15th of this month, to reimburse the Bank of America the sum of fifty thousand dollars, advanced to pay the pensions due in July last, and afterwards to meet the payment of pensions due on the first of January, 1841. The letter now read from the Secretary informs us that this Cincinnati stock has actually been sold—at what price, Mr. T. did not know.

Mr. ANDERSON of Maine interposed to say that the stock had been sold for $62,000.

Mr. THOMAS resumed. Be it so: it is not material for my purpose whether the stock was sold at par or below par. If it sold for the sum mentioned by the gentleman from Maine, add that to the $18,647 61 cash in hand on the first of December, and we have about $80,000, out of which is to be paid the sum of $51,476 73 due to pensioners on the first of January next: and there will be a balance of less than $30,000 to be applied to the payment of pensions for the year 1841.

The pensions for 1841, if the act of 1837 is not repealed, will, we are informed, be about $103,000. If the bill before us be passed in its present form, making an appropriation of $151,476, by adding that sum to the $30,000 of surplus from the sale of stock, we shall have provided a fund of $181,476 to make good the deficiency in the pension fund. Now, what is the amount of that deficiency? The whole amount of stock unsold is, in nominal value, $58,739. The annual charge upon the pension fund will be $103,000, if the act of 1837 is not repealed; and if that act is repealed, then the annual charge on the pension fund will be $58,000, according to the statements from the Navy Department. He hoped that the act would be repealed, and that we should have to provide only the last named sum in each year to pay these pensions. To produce an annual income to that amount, we must appropriate at least one million of dollars to be invested, if we propose in that way to make good the deficiency in the fund. The small surplus which will be left out of the appropriation now proposed, will afford very limited means to make such an investment. If, instead of making such an investment to create a capital in place of that which Congress has misapplied, we intend to pay the navy pensioners who are to be on the pension roll, whether the law of 1837 is or is not repealed, by an annual appropriation, still it seemed to him that there was no necessity for reconsidering the vote of the House to reduce the appropriation in this bill. A large proportion of it would be expended next year. The balance would be unexpended on the first of January, 1841, and would serve to pay the first half year of pensions due on the first day of July, 1842.

Under these circumstances, Mr. T. expressed the hope that the House would not reconsider. It would be much better for all who desired to get rid of the obnoxious law of 1837 in the form we have now undertaken to do it; and as to other questions connected with the pensions, they can be rightly disposed of when another bill, which the Naval Committee is prepared to report, comes before the House.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON contended that the trust fund under the law of 1800 ought not to have been touched. Congress had no right to touch the money sacredly appropriated to a class of men who had dearly earned it with toil and blood. As, however, it had been taken, he trusted that no time would be lost in refunding it.

Messrs. ANDERSON, MONROE, EVERETT, REED, and NAYLOR, severally gave their views, a notice of which will appear hereafter; when Mr. JAMESON moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. TURNEY moved to adjourn, which motion prevailed.

And the House adjourned.

The bill for the relief of the corporate authorities of the city of Mobile, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes, was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. NORVELL said that the bill proposed to establish a new land district north of the Grand river, in the State of Michigan. The information for which his colleague had called, upon this subject, had been received. It amounted simply to this: that in that portion of the present district which the bill was intended to establish as a new district, only between two and three hundred acres of the public lands had been sold. This new land office was designed to induce persons to go into that country for the purpose of making purchases, by the convenience and accommodation which it would afford to them. If his colleague, however, was adverse to the bill, he was not disposed to press its passage. He had done his duty in bringing it before the Senate. He believed it was required by the interest of the State; but it was for the Senate to dispose of it as they thought proper. They had passed it last session by a vote of two to one.

Mr. FORTER spoke at some length in opposition to the passage of the bill, as unnecessary and unasked for by the people of Michigan.

Mr. NORVELL regretted that his colleague was ashamed to ask for the object contemplated in this bill. He, himself, was ashamed of making application for nothing which would promote the interest of his State. The bill was not to go into effect until the fourth of July next; and then, if his recollection served him correctly, it would be at the discretion of the President to postpone its operation until the public interest required it to go into effect. That, at least, was the intention; and he thought the bill contained such a provision, as it passed at the last session. Such bills, establishing land districts where few or no lands had been sold, were not unusual. They were not without frequent precedents. The present bill had met the approbation of the General Land Office. But if his colleague desired its defeat, he could move to lay it on the table, or indefinitely to postpone it.

After some further remarks from Mr. PORTER, (which, like his former remarks, were totally inaudible)—

Mr. ALLEN hoped the bill would be read. Scarcely a word uttered by the Senators engaged in its discussion had been heard in that part of the chamber, and they had no knowledge whatever of its provisions.

The bill was accordingly read.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and decided in the negative—ayes 16, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Sevier, Tallmadge, Webster, and Williams—22.

The bill to revive and continue the acts incorporating the Banks of the District of Columbia was taken up, and, after some remarks by Messrs. MERRICK, TAPPAN, and CLAY of Alabama, was made the order of the day for the 8th of January next.

The bill granting a portion of land in the State of Indiana for the extension of the Wabash canal, which was partially discussed yesterday, being again in order,

Mr. TAPPAN rose to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Indiana. He said this claim was advocated on two grounds: first, that the State of Indiana ought to be allowed, by the law of 1827, to correct the location of her canal, the present terminus not being sufficiently low for river navigation; and the other was, that Congress having allowed to the State of Ohio the privilege of extending her canal from the first location from the foot of the rapids of the Maumee to Maumee bay, and having given to Ohio the land on each side of the canal, of two and a half miles, as by the act of 1827, the same right to extend the location of the canal, and the same grant of adjoining land, ought to be ceded to the State of Indiana. Now, he did not agree with the Senator from Indiana in either of these positions, though he agreed with him that Congress might properly make a grant of the land for the extension of the canal for ninety miles, from Tippecanoe river to Terre Haute, if it could be shown to be expedient so to extend that canal; but he did not believe the act of 1827 would bear the construction which the Senator from Indiana gave to it. When it was found that Congress had sold some of the land within the five miles originally granted, and Congress had made up to the State of Indiana the quantity thus taken, he believed there was an end of that grant: it was a grant made and executed between the Government of the United States and the State of Indiana, and then there was an end of it; and the State of Indiana had now no right to claim under the act of 1827. Then as to the claim that a similar grant had been made to the State of Ohio, he referred to a document of the third session of the twenty-fifth Congress, containing a number of papers concerning this claim—to the opinions of the Attorney General, and of the Commissioner of the Land Office, and the present Solicitor of the Treasury; the whole of which, he said, were given on a misconception of the facts, Mr. Birchard alone understanding them, whose opinion, therefore, necessarily differed from those which had been referred to by the Senator from Indiana. In support of this assertion, which he apprehended some gentlemen might consider a strong one, he entered with some minuteness of detail into the progression of the work, and the authority by which it was accomplished, to show that it was erroneously alleged that there was more than one location of the canal in the State of Ohio, which was made by the only competent authority of the State; and consequently the argument of the Senator from Indiana, founded on a change from an original line, and an extension of the canal, beyond the limits of Stansbury's survey, was not well founded. That which was called an extension to the Maumee bay, was in fact an original location; and yet on this singular error, the Senator from Indiana based the report which he presented to Congress during the last session. On this branch of the subject he (Mr. TAPPAN) desired to be perfectly understood, for the gentleman from Indiana had expressed great surprise that a Senator from Ohio should undertake to oppose this bill. Why, Ohio was interested in this work; for the extension of this canal would increase the business on the canals of Ohio, and for this reason he was in favor of the grant of the land, but he wished it to be a direct and honest grant—he was unwilling that the Senate should be imposed upon by any statement that was not true. The hypothesis was, that land had been granted for an extension of the canal to the State of Ohio, and therefore a similar grant ought to be made to the State of Indiana. Now there had been no such grant to Ohio; he conceded that Government had been liberal to the State of Ohio; but whenever that State asked for any thing, it was asked for openly, fairly, and honorably, and not because cessions had been made to sister States. If the Senator from Indiana would bring in a bill to grant this land, he (Mr. TAPPAN) would give it his support; otherwise he must press his motion to refer back this bill to the committee, with instructions to report a grant.

Mr. SMITH said the Senator from Ohio was mistaken as to the ground he (Mr. SMITH) had taken; he denied that he had adduced grants of land to the State of Ohio as a reason why this grant should be made to the State of Indiana; he had merely introduced that reference to show that this grant would not be the creation of a precedent—such precedents having been already created. He proceeded at some length to defend his original arguments, and to sustain his array of facts; after which,

Mr. TAPPAN briefly rejoined.

The motion to recommit was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After a short Executive session,

The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

WASHINGTON CITY, Jan. 1, 1841.

MESSRS. BLAIR and RIVES: In the Globe of yesterday, you report the proceedings in the Senate upon a bill to give certain lands to the State of Indiana, in which report the remarks made by me are strangely misrepresented. I said "the bill was, in substance, a grant of 288,000 acres of land to aid the State in making a canal from the mouth of Tippecanoe river to Terre Haute, under the pretence of an extension of the Wabash and Maumee canal from the former to the latter point, under the authority of the act of 1827, and because a similar grant of land had been made to the State of Ohio, upon her extending the north end of the canal from the foot of the Maumee rapids to Maumee bay; that I was not opposed to a grant being made to Indiana of the land asked for, if it were made as a direct grant; but I was opposed to this bill, for it placed the claim of Indiana upon false positions. The first position was, that they had a right to extend their canal from the mouth of Tippecanoe river to Terre Haute, when in fact they had located their canal from the east line of the State to the Tippecanoe, in 1829, and had received from the United States all the land they claimed under the act of 1827, in the year 1830—that I did not believe the act of 1827 admitted the construction now attempted to be given it; for if Indiana, in 1836, was permitted to extend their canal 90 miles, and claim 288,000 acres of land to make it, she might go on extending it, from time to time, to the mouth of the Wabash. I believed the act allowed of but one location, which had been made in 1829. That the second position was still more untenable; it assumed that the State of Ohio first located her part of the canal from the Indiana line to the foot of the Maumee rapids, selected and received her land under this location, and years afterwards extended her location from the foot of the rapids to Maumee bay, and made a new selection of land upon this extension, and received it from the United States. Now the fact was, that when Indiana ceded to Ohio the land in Ohio, which, by the act of 1827, had been given to make the Maumee part of the canal, no location of that part of the canal had ever been made. Stansbury's survey, which, as to the Wabash part of the canal, had been adopted as the line of canal in Indiana, was never recognised by the State of Ohio, and that but one location of the canal had ever been made by Ohio, and that was made by the board of public works in 1836, and extended from the line of Indiana to the Maumee bay." This is the substance of what I said.

Your Reporter mistakes the quantity of land.

"He did not object to the grant of land if made specifically to aid in constructing the canal, but to the form of the grant;" instead of "but to this he did not rise to object."

Instead of "from the boundary line of Indiana to Lake Erie," say, from the foot of the rapids of the Maumee to Maumee bay.

Instead of "the grant was confirmed to the foot of the Maumee rapids," say, located her canal from the State line to the mouth of Tippecanoe river, and selected and received her lands in 1830 according to such location.

The words "an application was accordingly made to Congress for the land selected, and Congress made the grant as desired," are not mine. I expressed no such idea.

The words "which was double the quantity originally set down," are none of my using.

Unfortunately for me, your Reporters have made me utter more nonsense than I am willing to father.

Yours,

BENJ. TAPPAN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, December 31, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

1. From the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 23d instant, calling upon him to communicate, "if compatible with the public interests, copies of all the correspondence between this Government and the Government of Great Britain, relative to any proceeding on the part of that Government which may have a tendency to interrupt our commerce with China.

2. From the Secretary of State, in compliance with the provisions of the act of March, 1799, communicating "an abstract of all the returns made to that Department by the collectors of the customs, pursuant to the act of the 28th of May, 1796, for the relief and protection of American seamen, showing, so far as said returns have been received, the number of seamen registered in each port of entry in the United States during the year commencing on the 1st of October of the last, and ending on the 30th of September of the present year."

3. From the Treasury Department, in reply to the resolution of the House of the 17th instant, respecting the condition of the custom-house buildings at Philadelphia.

4. From the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State with accompanying papers, in answer to a resolution of the House, calling for information relative to the BURNING OF THE STEAMBOAT CAROLINE.

The above communications were severally referred, and ordered to be printed.

Also, the following letter from J. C. Rives, on the subject of the printing:

GLOBE OFFICE, WASHINGTON,

December 30, 1840.

Sir: It is known to you, and to the other members of the House of Representatives, that Francis P. Blair and myself were elected printers to the House in January last. Under this election, I expected that all the printing for the House during the Twenty-sixth Congress, would be sent to us to execute; and as I superintend that branch of our business, I engaged men, and provided materials sufficient to do it with at least the customary despatch. I was informed yesterday that the Clerk of the House had sent a very large report to the Stationer of the House, to be printed by him, and that the Stationer was actually printing it, or having it printed.

Since I received this information, I have turned to the Clerk's account of the expenditure of the contingent fund for the last year, where I find that he has paid other persons for printing which I think should have been executed by the Printers to the House.

The persons engaged by me to work on Congressional documents exclusively, have not had more than three or four days' constant employment since the commencement of this session. There has been some work for them every day, but not enough to employ them the whole day. They are engaged by the week, and we have to pay them, whether they work or not. Now, if the Clerk of the House has the power to have the Congress printing executed at other offices, when there has been no failure at our office in executing it promptly, I desire to know it as soon as possible, so that I may either reduce our force, or make some arrangement with the Clerk to get enough of it to keep our hands employed. The prices now paid to us by the House of Representatives are so low, that we must sink money, unless we can keep the hands which we have engaged to do its printing, constantly employed; and upon some kinds of printing we sink money, even when all our hands are employed upon it.

The Clerk of the House and myself have had a controversy about the binding of the documents, which I wish to bring before the House.

Soon after the adjournment of Congress, in July last, the Clerk sent word to me to deliver the documents which we had printed for the House, to S. D. Langtree, to bind. I refused to do it. It has been the invariable custom, ever since I became acquainted with the manner of executing the Congress printing, which is now thirteen years, for the Printer to bind all the documents that he prints for Congress. Whenever a Printer has been elected during that time, he has as invariably fitted up a bindery, as he has a printing office. I had purchased a great part of the materials for the binding, and had engaged workmen to do it, and had folded a great quantity of the work, before the Clerk sent me word that he wished the documents handed over to Mr. Langtree to be bound. The correspondence between the Clerk and myself, which I presume he has on file, will fully explain our controversy about the binding. I wish Congress to decide between us as soon as possible, as it is necessary that the binding should be forwarded.

Respectfully,

JOHN C. RIVES.

Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ADAMS said he would take that occasion to inquire whether a report of the Committee on the Printing of the House had been made at the last session; and if so, whether it had been printed.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana said there were two reports on that subject, which had been laid before the House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ADAMS said he had never been able to get a sight of the reports, although very anxious so to do. Neither himself nor other members could procure copies of the documents ordered to be printed at the last session, being more than five or six months ago. This letter, however, from Messrs. Blair and Rives, explained it, and it appeared that the delay was all owing to this controversy between them and the Clerk of the House.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved to refer the letter to the Committee on Accounts; but the motion was subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. J. W. DAVIS moved the following:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, and that the letter of J. C. Rives, just read, be referred to that committee.

Mr. MORGAN offered an amendment instructing the committee to inquire as to whether the Clerk was interested in the contract with Langtree and O'Sullivan for furnishing stationery to this House.

Mr. REED submitted an additional amendment instructing the committee to extend the inquiry to the lithographing and engraving of maps.

After some debate of a desultory character, the amendments were withdrawn. The resolution of Mr. DAVIS was then agreed to; and, on motion of Mr. ADAMS, the letter ordered to be printed.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, reported a bill from the Committee on Manufactures, entitled "A bill to insure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports," which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BARNARD asked the consent of the House to introduce a bill (of which intention he had given previous notice) on the subject of bankruptcy.

Objection being made, leave was not granted.

NAVY PENSIONS.

The next business in order was the motion of Mr. GIDDINGS to reconsider the vote by which the bill making appropriation for the payment of navy pensions had been passed, containing an amendment repealing the act of 1837.

The previous question, on the reconsideration, having been demanded by Mr. JAMESON, Mr. ADAMS endeavored to prevail on him to withdraw it.

Mr. JAMESON was willing to oblige the gentleman from Massachusetts as soon as any member of the House, but could not, consistent with his duty, withdraw the call.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question, on the motion to reconsider, ordered to be put; and, being put, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Boardman, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dellet, Doe, Edwards, Everett, Gates, Giddings, Granger, Henry, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lane, Leet, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Moore, Moore, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Morrow, Naylor, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Peck, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rodgers, Russell, Saltonstall, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, John White, Thomas W. Williams, and Winthrop—69.

So the House refused to reconsider, and, as far as it is concerned, the act of 1837 is repealed.

Mr. FILLMORE, after advertising to the great importance of the President's message in relation to the burning of the Caroline, moved that 5,000 extra copies of the same, with the accompanying documents, be printed.

Mr. PICKENS hoped the motion of the gentleman from New York would prevail. The documents were of the highest importance.

Mr. STANLY said he objected to the printing of the document, if it contained any of the State Rights doctrines of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. PICKENS said he expected the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] would object to such doctrines. But, said Mr. P. let the reply of the Secretary of State be published, and then see whether the virtue, and patriotism, and intelligence of the people of this country will object to its spirit or doctrines; and if they do, then we are no longer an independent people.

The motion to print was then agreed to.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings, Mr. ALFORD moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the above motion had been agreed to, and called for the reading of the documents, which were read accordingly, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in answer to their resolution of the 21st instant.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28, 1840.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Dec. 28, 1840.

SIR: The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, dated the 21st instant, requesting the President "to communicate to that House (if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest) all the correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain, or the officers or agents of either, or the officers and agents of this Government with the President or any of its Departments, which has not heretofore been communicated to that House, on the subject of the outrage of burning the Caroline on the Niagara frontier; and whether there is any prospect of compensation being made to the owner of said boat for the loss thereof; and, also, whether any communications have been made to this Government in regard to the arrest and imprisonment of — McLeod, by the authorities of the State of New York, for being concerned in said outrage; and, if so, that he communicate a copy thereof to that House," has the honor to report to the President, in answer to that resolution, the accompanying papers.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

To the President of the U. States of America.

Mr. Stevenson to Mr. Forsyth.—Extract.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, July 2, 1839.

I regret to say that no answer has yet been given to my note in the case of the "Caroline." I have not deemed it proper under the circumstances to press the subject without further instructions from your Department. If it is the wish of the Government that I should do so, I pray to be informed of it, and the degree of urgency that I am to adopt.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Stevenson.—Extract.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 11th September, 1839.

With reference to the closing paragraph of your communication to the Department, dated the 2d of July last, (No. 74,) it is proper to inform you that no instructions are at present required for again bringing forward the question of the "Caroline." I have had frequent conversations with Mr. Fox in regard to this subject—one of very recent date—and from him, and the President expects the British Government will answer your application in the case without much further delay.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, December 13, 1840.

SIR: I am informed by his Excellency the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Upper Canada, that Mr. Alexander McLeod, a British subject, and late deputy sheriff of the Niagara district in Upper Canada, was arrested at Lewiston, in the State of New York, on the 12th of last month, on a pretended charge of murder and arson, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the piratical steamboat "Caroline," in the month of December, 1837. After a tedious and vexatious examination, Mr. McLeod was committed for trial, and he is now imprisoned in Lockport jail.

I feel it my duty to call upon the Government of the United States to take prompt and effectual steps for the liberation of Mr. McLeod. It is well known that the destruction of the steamboat "Caroline" was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities. That act, therefore, according to the usages of nations, can only be the subject of discussion between the two National Governments: It cannot justly be made the ground of legal proceedings in the United States against the individuals concerned, who were bound to obey the authorities appointed by their own Government.

I may add that I believe it is quite notorious that Mr. McLeod was not one of the party engaged in the destruction of the steamboat "Caroline;" and that the pretended charge upon which he has been imprisoned rests only upon the perjured testimony of certain Canadian outlaws and their abettors, who, unfortunately for the peace of that neighborhood, are still permitted by the authorities of the State of New York to infest the Canadian frontier.

The question, however, of whether Mr. McLeod was or was not concerned in the destruction of the "Caroline," is beside the purpose of the present communication. That act was the public act of persons obeying the constituted authorities of her Majesty's Province. The National Government of the United States thought themselves called upon to remonstrate against it; and a remonstrance which the President did accordingly address to her Majesty's Government, is still, I believe, a pending subject of diplomatic discussion between her Majesty's Government and the United States Legation in London. I feel, therefore, justified in expecting that the President's Government will see the justice and the necessity of causing the present immediate release of Mr. McLeod, as well as of taking such steps as may be requisite for preventing others of her Majesty's subjects from being persecuted or molested in the United States in a similar manner for the future.

It appears that Mr. McLeod was arrested on the 12th ultimo; that after the examination of witnesses, he was finally committed for trial on the 18th, and placed in confinement in the jail of Lockport, awaiting the assizes, which will be held there in February next. As the case is naturally occasioning a great degree of excitement and indignation within the British frontier, I earnestly hope that it may be in your power to give me an early and satisfactory answer to the present representation.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c. &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 26, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge, and have laid before the President, your letter of the 13th instant, touching the arrest and imprisonment of Alexander McLeod, a British subject, and late Deputy Sheriff of the Niagara District, in Upper Canada, on a charge of murder and arson, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the steamboat "Caroline," in the month of December, 1837; in respect to which you state that you feel it your duty to call upon the Government of the United States to take prompt and effectual steps for the liberation of Mr. McLeod, and to prevent others of the subjects of her Majesty, the Queen of Great Britain, from being persecuted or molested in a similar manner, for the future.

This demand, with the grounds upon which it is made, has been duly considered by the President; with a sincere desire to give to it such a reply as will not only manifest a proper regard for the character and rights of the United States, but, at the same time, tend to preserve the amicable relations which, so advantageously for both, subsist between this country and England. Of the reality of this disposition, and of the uniformity with which it has been evinced in the many delicate and difficult questions which have arisen between the two countries in the last few years, no one can be more convinced than yourself. It is then with unfeigned regret that the President finds himself unable to recognise the validity of a demand, a compliance with which you deem so material to the preservation of the good understanding which has been hitherto manifested between the two countries.

The jurisdiction of the several States which constitute the Union is, within its appropriated sphere perfectly independent of the Federal Government. The offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged was committed within the territory, and against the laws and citizens of the State of New York, and is one that comes clearly within the competency of her tribunals. It does, not, therefore present an occasion where, under the Constitution and laws of the Union, the interposition called for would be proper, or for which a warrant can be found in the powers with which the Federal Executive is invested. Nor would the circumstances to which you have referred, or the reasons you have urged, justify the exertion of such a power, if it existed. The transaction out of which the question arises, presents the case of a most unjustifiable invasion, in time of peace, of a portion of the territory of the United States, by a band of armed men from the adjacent territory of Canada, the forcible capture by them within our own waters, and the subsequent destruction of a steamboat, the property of a citizen of the United States, and the murder of one or more American citizens. If arrested at the time, the offenders might unquestionably have been brought to justice by the judicial authorities of the State within whose acknowledged territory these crimes were committed; and their subsequent voluntary entrance within that territory, places them in the same situation. The President is not aware of any principle of international law, or indeed of reason or justice, which entitles such offenders to impunity before the legal tribunals, when coming voluntarily within their independent and undoubted jurisdiction, because they acted in obedience to their superior authorities, or because their acts have become the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two Governments. These methods of redress, the legal prosecution of the offenders, and the application of their Government for satisfaction, are independent of each other, and may be separately and simultaneously pursued. The avowal or justification of the outrage by the British authorities, might be a ground of complaint with the Government of the United States, distinct from the violation of the territory and laws of the State of New York. The application of the Government of the Union to that of Great Britain, for the redress of an authorized outrage of the peace, dignity, and rights of the United States, cannot deprive the State of New York of her undoubted right of vindicating, through the exercise of her judicial power, the property and lives of her citizens. You have very properly regarded the alleged absence of Mr. McLeod from the scene of the offence at the time when it was committed, as not material to the decision of the present question. That is a matter to be decided by legal evidence; and the sincere desire of the President is, that it may be satisfactorily established. If the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities, this fact has not been before communicated to the Government of the United States by a person authorized to make the admission; and it will be for the court which has taken cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged, to decide upon its validity when legally established before it.

The President deems this to be a proper occasion to remind the Government of her Britannic Majesty that the case of the "Caroline" has been long since brought to the attention of her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who, up to this day, has not communicated its decision thereupon. It is hoped that the Government of her Majesty will perceive the importance of no longer leaving the Government of the United States uninformed of its views and intentions upon a subject which has naturally produced much exasperation, and which has led to such grave consequences.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

H. S. Fox, esq. &c. &c. &c.

The documents accompanying the President's message, in relation to the BURNING OF THE STEAMBOAT CAROLINE, having been read, and the question being on the reconsideration of the vote by which 5,000 extra copies had been ordered to be printed,

Mr. ALFORD said he was happy that he had moved the reconsideration, and that he was now satisfied, having heard the papers read, that they ought to be printed. He was satisfied that the answer of Mr. Forsyth was a good State Rights paper; and he should think that his instincts of justice were blunted by party spirit, if he were capable of doing injustice to that officer under any circumstances. He (Mr. A.) hoped that the party strife which had just passed had not blunted the instincts of justice of the great Whig party of the United States, nor of the State Rights party, of which he had lived an humble member, and of which he hoped to die a member. He was satisfied that the rights of the Empire State of New York had been vindicated by the Secretary of State in an able and dignified manner; and he was sorry to say that this was the only paper coming from that Department that he could commend in that light.

As regarded his sympathy towards the Northeastern territory, he, as a Southern man, had not more than he ought to have; but he did know that the Lion of England had been growling for his prey on that Northeastern boundary long ago. As an American citizen, he felt humbled at the reflection that, under the administration of Martin Van Buren, the Eagle of his country had cowered under the Lion of England; he felt humbled that a country which, even in the days of the Revolution, was strong enough to defend its rights, should now permit the Queen of England to deprive them of every thing. Aggression after aggression had been committed, and it would continue to be so so long as the head of the Executive Government failed to defend the doctrines contained in this document.

Mr. A. then withdrew the motion to reconsider.

Mr. STANLEY renewed it.

Mr. HOLMES of South Carolina said he was quite delighted with this debate; not, however, because the incidental question of State rights had been introduced, for that was about the same thing as the Constitution, which every man construed according to his own taste. But he was delighted because the gentleman from Georgia had given his approval to at least one act of the Administration. He was glad that one member of the opposite party had the generosity to acknowledge them in the right for once. The gentleman had, however, touched on the very important subject of the Northeastern boundary. He had said that the Lion of England had growled, while we paid no regard to it, etc. Now he (Mr. H.) wished to know whether the remarks made by that gentleman were to be considered ominous of the future action of the new Administration? Were we not to judge, from the remarks made by one of its friends, that we were to be precipitated into a conflict with this mighty power, prepared and armed at every point, and that, too, for a line of demarcation? If they were to rush into the conflict—if the South was to be prostrated, he was thankful that gentlemen had shown their hands, that the South might know that one of the results attending the triumph of this great party, was a question of territorial war.

Mr. ALFORD replied to these remarks, and said that he had not spoken in behalf of the coming Administration. He had it not in his eye or his mind at the time he spoke; he knew nothing of its secrets nor its intentions. He had had no conference with its friends, nor had his advice ever been asked. He spoke for himself—he spoke the sentiments of his own heart, when he said that the Lion of England had growled for its prey on the Northeastern boundary. Whatever might be the opinion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES,] he (Mr. A.) would express his belief that, if ever the issue of which the gentleman spoke did come, the State of South Carolina would be seen in the first ranks, gallantly defending the honor, and maintaining the rights of the nation. This much he could say—he being one of the first born of nullification out of South Carolina—that South Carolina would be the last to hide her head, if the country should ever be engaged in a war with Britain. His own wish was, that we never might have war with her on this or any other question, if it could be honorably avoided.

For the part which he had taken in the recent victorious struggle, he claimed no honor distinct from his colleagues and his country; and in characterizing as he had done the communication of Mr. Forsyth, he (Mr. A.) had done only that which a sense of justice dictated.

Mr. CUSHING, after some preliminary remarks in relation to the great importance of the subject involved in the documents, called particular attention to the fact, that this was the first time it had been officially avowed that the outrage on the Caroline was authorized by the Government of Great Britain. You will perceive, said Mr. C. that Mr. Fox says:

"It is well known that the destruction of the steamboat Caroline was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities."

He (Mr. C.) denied the fact, that the outrage being perpetrated under the authority of the British authorities, had been "well known," as alleged by Mr. Fox. Two years ago, Lord Palmerston was asked that question, but it had never been avowed until the present time. Therefore, he would repeat that the assertion as to the fact now avowed being "well known," was, in point of fact, untrue. This had been very properly noticed by the Secretary of State in his reply to Mr. Fox, as follows:

"If the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities, this fact has not been before communicated to the Government of the United States."

The fact of this avowal, however, gave the subject an importance which it did not before possess. Mr. C. then proceeded to show that as the authorities of the Colonial Provinces had punished American citizens engaged in piratical acts on their coast, by a parity of reasoning the State of New York had the same right to punish persons engaged in piratical acts within her waters.

Mr. C. then entered into a vindication of the friends of General Harrison, and complained that while at one time they were charged with being the allies and tools of Great Britain, they were now charged with a design to involve the country in war with that power. He denied both the charges.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] when and where the Administration had charged the Whigs with being the "tools of Great Britain." Let the member lay his finger upon the place where it had been asserted by any paper, or present, if he could, any such extract to the House. The Whig party had not been charged by the Van Buren press with being the "tools" of Great Britain; but they had been charged with being under the influence of the moneyed aristocracy of that country—under the influence of British gold. And, said Mr. D. I would advise gentlemen, before they engage in such debates as these, first to clear themselves from that charge. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts pause before making such a charge against the Democratic party, and clear his own party from the just charge of acting under the influence of the moneyed aristocracy of Great Britain. Mr. D. here desired the Clerk to read an extract from a paper he held in his hand; but

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the subject on which the gentleman was speaking was not in order on a motion to reconsider the printing of documents.

Mr. DUNCAN was perfectly willing to speak in order; but if he was out of order in showing the falsity of a charge against the Administration, why was not the gentleman who made that charge called to order? Mr. D. said the charge against the Democratic party having been made, and he having denied it, he was now about to prove that the Whigs and the institutions of the country were governed and managed by the moneyed aristocracy of England.

After some conversation of a desultory character,

Mr. STANLY withdrew his motion to reconsider. So the question was no longer before the House.

SCHOOLS FOR INDIANS.

Mr. MASON of Ohio asked leave to move a resolution which was read at the Clerk's table; and no objection being made, the resolution was introduced, and it was agreed to, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House in what manner that part of the 20th article of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw nation, made at Dancing Rabbit Creek, and dated September 27, 1830, has been executed, which stipulates that "for the benefit and advantage of the Choctaw people, and to improve their condition, there shall be educated under the direction of the President and at the expense of the United States, forty Choctaw youths for twenty years."

And that he communicate copies of all such regulations as may have been adopted, of orders issued, and correspondence had, relating to the execution of that stipulation, and state what amount of money has been appropriated, and what amount expended on account thereof; what agent or agents have been employed, their names, number, and compensation; whether an academy or other school has been established for the education of the Choctaw youths, and at what time and place; whether teachers have been employed, and the names, number, and compensation of each; what number of the Choctaw youths, or other persons, if any, have been received into, or educated at, such school, and at what cost per scholar; what buildings, if any, have been erected for the accommodation of such school, and at what cost; and what branches of learning have been taught there; and how many pupils have graduated, and in what term of time after their admission; and what is the present number of teachers and pupils belonging to the school.

And that he be required to make a similar report and statement in regard to the execution of so much of the same article of said treaty as provides that "fifty thousand dollars, viz: twenty-five hundred dollars annually, shall be given for the support of three teachers of schools for twenty years."

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS.

The States and Territories were then called for petitions. They were presented by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa.

Mr. DOWNING, of Florida.

Mr. CRARY, of Michigan.

Mr. JAMESON, of Missouri.

[Mr. JAMESON presented the memorial of the Legislature of Missouri on the subject of the northern boundary of that State. Also, the memorial from same on the subject of the swamp lands; and also, the petition of Wm. Turney for an additional pension. [Mr. TOLAND remarked that he was desirous of presenting a memorial of the Anti-slavery Society of Eastern Pennsylvania, which prayed for a change or amendment of the Constitution of the United States, regarding the toleration of slavery. He did not conceive, inasmuch as it asked for an alteration in the fundamental law of the land, that it came within the rule of the House prohibiting the reception of petitions upon the subject of slavery; that the SPEAKER, however, might think differently; and that, for the purpose of ascertaining his opinion, he would send him the memorial to examine at his seat. Mr. T. also remarked, that if the SPEAKER decided that the memorial came under the rule, he should feel it his duty to take an appeal.]

The SPEAKER examined the memorial, and observed that he was not surprised at the doubts of the gentlemen, that he felt it, however, to be his duty to decide that it did come within the class excluded by the rule; but that he had no objection to the appeal which Mr. T. said he would take.

Mr. TOLAND then took the appeal—the question was put, and the SPEAKER's decision was affirmed without a division.]

Mr. EASTMAN, of New Hampshire.

Mr. SLADE, of Vermont.

Mr. BOARDMAN, of Connecticut.

Mr. CRANSTON, of Rhode Island.

Messrs. BRIGGS, CUSHING, PARMENTER, REED, SALTONSTALL, ADAMS, and CALHOUN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. ADAMS presented a letter, which he considered in the nature of a petition, from a Mr. Attree, of New York, who considered his character as a Reporter and a man injuriously assailed by the "reading, in the House of Representatives, by Mr. MONROE, of New York, of a letter from Mr. Jaffray of that city, in which a report made by said Attree was represented as a burlesque of a speech delivered by Mr. Jaffray at a certain meeting held in New York, and by the remarks of Mr. MONROE and Mr. WISE thereon. Mr. A. said he did not know the individual, nor did he know he had ever seen him, unless it might have been once, when he was engaged in reporting a lecture which Mr. A. had delivered (on any thing but politics) shortly before the commencement of the present session; but he presented and would ask for the reading of the letter as an act of justice to the person concerned.

Some remarks fell from Mr. A. which related to the part Mr. MONROE had taken in the debate on the bill reported by Mr. A. for the prevention of frauds on the revenue.

The letter having been read—

Mr. MONROE of New York expressed his surprise and regret that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts had thought it proper to bring a matter like this before that solemn assembly. The communication, as published in the Herald, had reached the city the night before, and Mr. M.'s attention had been called to it, supposing it might contain something personal to himself and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE.) He had carefully examined it to see whether the writer, in any part of it, had taken exception to the course of the honorable Mr. WISE and himself in what they had said, a few days since, in relation to the report of Mr. Jaffray's speech, and he did not so understand the writer. In what Mr. M. had said, in the spur of the moment, he had had no intention to call in question the qualifications of Mr. Attree as a Reporter, or the accuracy of the Herald; but he had, on a perusal of his report of Mr. Jaffray's speech on the necessity of the merchants of New York employing an agent at Washington, been led at once to conclude that it must have been a burlesque of the speech actually delivered; for he could not believe that any one, who wished, as Mr. Jaffray did, to prevent the passage of a law in Congress, could ever be so blind to his own interests as to make such a speech as that given as his in the New York Herald.

But further: Mr. Jaffray had himself published, in that very paper, a letter or card, positively denying the correctness of the report, and representing it as a caricature of his remarks; which card had been published in the Herald, without editorial comment or remark, to his knowledge. Hence Mr. M. concluded, of course, as any man would naturally conclude, that the report was admitted by the editor to have been, as it was charged to be, a mere playful burlesque. Mr. M. said he was not there to defend Mr. Jaffray, nor was he there to assail any man. When the report of Mr. Jaffray's letter had been read, he perceived that it had more effect in the House than he could have thought it at all likely to have; and apprehending that the character of the great body of the merchants of New York might possibly be injuriously affected by the impression it produced, and from the comments of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] on the proceedings of the meeting at which it had been delivered, Mr. M. as in duty bound, had risen in their defence, and had endeavored to show that they were in no wise justly implicated. As to this Mr. Attree, Mr. M. had no doubt he was one of the best reporters in this country. He had said nothing against his capacity or character, but he had honestly supposed the report was a burlesque. He repeated that he had not risen to defend Mr. Jaffray or to attack the editor or reporter of the Herald, but merely to perform a duty to his constituents, by preventing misapprehension on this floor. As an evidence of the total contempt in which this whole matter was regarded in New York, in all the letters he had received from that city, not a word was said in any one of them about it. In fact, it was too ridiculous an affair for Mr. M. to have any thing further to do with, and he washed his hands of it.

Mr. ADAMS said that, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. MONROE] had alluded to him as intending, in any remarks he had submitted, to injure the character of the merchants of New York—

Mr. MONROE promptly interposed to disavow any such idea; he was fully aware that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts would be one of the very last men unjustly to assail the reputation of so respectable a body of men, or of any other class of citizens throughout this country.

Mr. ADAMS said this was sufficient for him. No man cherished a higher respect for the merchants of New York than he did; those, especially, who were in a proper sense American merchants. But the meeting, calling itself a meeting of the merchants of New York, consisted of a very different description of persons; being composed, chiefly, of Scotchmen and Yorkshire clothiers; the very men against whose frauds the bill he had introduced was aimed. As to the remarks of Mr. Jaffray on himself, he should say nothing, save to that portion of them which charged him with "having been closeted for two hours with the Collector of New York" when Mr. A. was coming on to Congress—to which he plead guilty; he had been closeted with that officer, though not quite for two hours. He had gone at the request of the Collector, who, hearing of his being in the city, had sent a note to him to see him at the custom-house; and in that conversation the Collector had expressed a very strong desire that that portion of the bill to prevent frauds on the revenue, which Mr. A. had formerly reported to this House, should be reported again. With Mr. HOYT or with Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, Mr. A. could claim little political sympathy; but he had gone as he was requested; and there it was stated to him that the frauds complained of were going on still, and that the bill was as necessary now as it had ever been; and the Collector had observed that his successor, whoever he might be, would find it so. The Secretary of the Treasury entertained the same desire for the passage of the bill. And Mr. A. would do both these officers of Government the justice to say that he believed, in this matter, they were disposed to discharge their public duty with fidelity; and he was willing, in this thing, to give to the proper wishes of the Treasury Department all the support in that House he was able.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON moved that so much of the President's message as relates to military affairs be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS objected. He said that the practice for some years had been for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and for some friend of the President then to portion out the President's message among the appropriate committees, by which means the whole of that document came under the consideration of the House. It was a good practice, and presented the only mode by which the House could get full possession of every part of the message. But, within the last few years, examples had crept in which he hoped, for all future times, would stand as warnings and not as admonitions, of not considering the message in Committee of the Whole, but of individual gentlemen picking out particular subjects in it, and having them referred to their own committees. This practice was not only irregular, but highly inexpedient and injurious, producing utter confusion in the legislation of the House. It prevented the House from getting the whole message under its discussion; and that which it did discuss was discussed under exposure, every moment, to the previous question, by which free discussion and full and ripe consideration was prevented. Here a gentleman wanted one particular portion of the message referred to the Committee on Military Affairs: but as Mr. A. considered the portions of the message on that subject as highly important, he desired the whole message should first be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and he felt the rather anxious on this point because the gentleman at the head of the military committee at the last session had proposed to add some 1,500 or 1,600 men to the standing army of the United States. If the House did go into Committee of the Whole, Mr. A. should very probably deliver sentiments on several of the subjects it contained very different from those expressed by the President. He hoped the gentleman would change his motion.

Mr. THOMPSON consented, in pursuance of this suggestion, to change his motion for one to go into Committee of the Whole on the President's message, and make it the special order on Monday next. He denied, expressly, that the bill to which the honorable gentleman had alluded as introduced last session did propose to augment, by a single officer or man, the standing army of the United States; but its object was to protect a frontier exposed to the utmost dangers from savage depredation and massacre.

The motion, requiring two-thirds, was not agreed to.

Whereupon Mr. THOMPSON gave notice that he should renew his motion on Monday next.

THE NEW JERSEY ELECTION.

While petitions were being presented to-day, Mr. GARRET DAVIS, of Kentucky, asked leave to move the following resolution, which was read and objected to:

Whereas the majority of this House, about the close of the last session of Congress, did decide that Peter D. Vroom, Pallemon Dickerson, William R. Cooper, Daniel B. Ryall, and Joseph Kille, were "entitled to occupy as members of the House of Representatives the five contested seats from the State of New Jersey;" and said majority, with the exception of the members on the Committee of Elections, had had no opportunity of examining the testimony relating to said contested seats, and yet refused to permit said testimony to be read to the House, and proceeded to adjudge and decide the right to said seats in utter ignorance of the merits of the contest; therefore,

Be it resolved, That the aforesaid decision of the majority of this House ought to be rescinded, set aside, and held for naught.

Resolved, That this House will, in conformity to all precedent, to the decency, dignity, and justice of such proceedings, and to the sanction of their oaths and their duty as judges of the case, thoroughly examine the testimony, taken by its order, in relation to the conflicting claims to said seats, and will then impartially decide the right of the said Peter D. Vroom, Philemon Dickerson, Wm. R. Cooper, Daniel B. Ryall, and Joseph Kille, of the one part, and of John B. Aycrigg, Charles C. Stratton, J. B. Maxwell, William Halstead, and T. Jones Yorke, of the other part, to them.

Mr. RANDOLPH gave notice of a bill to determine by law the day for the annual meeting of Congress.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, all the memorials and other papers on file in relation to French spoliations previous to 1800, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and he gave notice that he should call the attention of the House to this subject on Thursday, the 7th of January next.

The following resolutions were introduced on leave during the presentation of petitions, and were agreed to by the House:

By Mr. MOORE:

Resolved, That the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated July 10, 1840, transmitting the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in relation to the claims filed in the land office at Opelousas, under the act of 6th February, 1835, for the final adjustment of claims to land in the State of Louisiana, with all the documents, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency and justice of establishing a post route from Springfield to Maxville, in Washington county, Kentucky, and from Maxville to Harrodsburg, in Mercer, and of providing by law for having the mail carried on said route as formerly.

By Mr. A. V. BROWN:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to Rowland Ledbetter, Alethea Allen, widow of Daniel Allen, and Cornelius Webb.

On motion of Mr. TRIPLETT,

The House adjourned over till Monday next.

After some remarks by Messrs. PRENTISS and MANGUM, Mr. M. offered to amend by inserting the word "white," so as to confine the benefits of the bill to white persons, which was adopted—ayes 37, nays 1, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Ben'on, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Mangum, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Young—37.

NAY—Mr. Porter—1.

Mr. MANGUM then moved to amend, by excepting aliens from the provisions of the bill, which was advocated by Messrs. MANGUM and CLAY of Kentucky, and opposed by Messrs. BUCHANAN, CLAY of Alabama, and BENTON; and the question on its adoption being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 12, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, and Ruggles—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Perier, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright and Young—30.

Mr. TAPPAN then moved to amend, by providing that no person should be permitted to avail himself of the benefits of the bill more than once; which was agreed to without a division.

The bill was then informally passed over, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 4, 1841.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, which were severally laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed, viz:

1. From the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, relative to the operations of that office during parts of the years 1839 and 1840.

2. From the Comptroller of the Treasury, in obedience to the act of 3d of March, 1809, "further to amend the several acts for the adjustment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," and of the act of 3d March, 1817, "to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts, transmitting a list of the balances standing on the books of the revenue, which have remained unsettled by collectors of the customs and others, which have been due more than three years prior to the 30th of September, 1839.

3. From the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in obedience to the act of 3d March, 1839, an abstract of disbursements under the head of Contingent Expenses of the Naval Establishment, as settled and allowed at the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, from the 1st day of October, 1839, to the 30th of September, 1840, inclusively.

4. From the Secretary of State, transmitting a list of the clerks employed in his Department during the past year, and the compensation of each.

5. From the Secretary of War, transmitting, in obedience to the modified resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of December last, a report of the Chief Engineer, and of the Colonel of Topographical Engineers, relative to the suspension of operations at the public works on the borders of the Western lakes and on the Cumberland Road.

6. A letter from the Clerk of the House, as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

I was not in my seat when a letter from J. C. Rives, one of the Printers to the House of Representatives, was laid before the House. As I learn from a report of the proceedings of the House, that that letter had been referred to a committee, I will merely state, that I have sent no "report to the Stationer of the House, to be printed by him," nor any other document, that could be claimed by the public Printer; that the "other persons paid for printing," as found in my report in the contingent fund, were so paid, under an order of the House, directing me to have the printing done, before a public Printer was elected; and that, by a special written agreement made by Messrs. Blair and Rives, documents of the last session, sufficient for the use of the members, were all to have been bound and delivered by them, at the beginning of present session.

I learn, further, from a report of the proceedings of the House, that to the motion of reference, an amendment was offered, instructing the committee to "inquire whether the Clerk was interested in the contract with Langtree and O'Sullivan, and the contracts with Langtree." Regarding this as an intimation that I have, by indirect and covert means, appropriated to my own use a portion of the public funds entrusted to my care, I cannot let it pass without notice.

Had the amendment been adopted, and inquiry made, I should have regarded it as an act of kindness; but having been introduced and then withdrawn, it might seem that I shrunk from the investigation.

When a similar charge was made against me at the last session, I immediately asked an investigation. A select committee was appointed with full powers to send for persons and papers, and to "inquire into all matters of frauds, all considerations of economy, and all other matters and things, in relation to contracts made by the Clerk of the House."

I was early informed by a member of that committee, that they considered the charge of fraud as altogether frivolous, and would proceed to investigate the other subjects referred to them.

I have no knowledge of the cause why they did not report at the last session. I hope it will be their pleasure to do so the present session, and make known the results of their inquiry as to all the matters referred to them.

But since the question of fraud and underhand interest has again been revived—thrown out as an intimation, and left to work its insidious influence on the public mind, uncontradicted, I here assert, that I have not now, nor have I ever had, the remotest interest in any contracts made in my official capacity; and that not a solitary silver has ever come into my pockets as an inducement, or in consequence of such contracts.

All my official acts have been open and above-board, and I am willing shall be known of all men.

No member of your honorable body has a higher sense than I have, of the duties of a public officer, and I would scorn a secret purloining of the Treasury by indirection and subterfuge, as much as I would an open and direct embezzlement.

I therefore ask your honorable body to cause inquiry to be made by a committee, whether the intimation of my being interested with Messrs. Langtree and O'Sullivan, S. D. Langtree, or any one else, in any contract made in my official capacity, or in any manner whatever, be true or false.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

HUGH A. GARLAND,

Clerk House of Representatives.

[JOHN C. RIVES has read the above letter of the Clerk of the House of Representatives; and as the subject is now before a committee of the House, he deems it improper, or impolitic, for him to say more at this time, than that it is his earnest desire that the Committee should proceed with the investigation as soon as possible, and decide who is in the wrong, the Clerk or himself. He would here beg leave to add, with due deference, that he still has more confidence in his own eyes, than he has in the Clerk's letter.]

Mr. MORGAN moved that it be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, thought the proper course would be to refer the communication of the Clerk to the same Select Committee who have under consideration the letter of Mr. Rives. Mr. D. made a motion to that effect.

Mr. MORGAN saw no necessity for referring it to a Select Committee. He hoped it would be laid on the table.

Mr. JAMES GARLAND hoped the gentleman from New York would withdraw the motion to lay on the table. He (Mr. G.) was in favor of an investigation. From an amendment offered on a previous day, an impression was likely to exist in the public mind that the Clerk had been interested in the contracts; but if there was no foundation for such a charge, as a matter of justice it ought to be made known, and the impression removed. He hoped, therefore, that the communication of the Clerk would be referred, so that if there was no ground for the implication, it might be made manifest.

The motion to lay on the table having precedence, was first put, and decided in the negative.

The question on the motion of Mr. DAVIS was then put, and it was agreed to. So the communication was referred, and ordered to be printed.

The States and Territories were then called for petitions. They were presented by NAVAL DEPOT IN RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. TILLINGHAST offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were read for information:

Whereas examinations and surveys have heretofore been made in the Narragansett bay, in Rhode Island, with a view to military and naval establishments, and reports have been made to the Navy Department, and communicated to Congress, containing evidence of the fitness and advantages of a place upon the waters of that bay for a naval depot—

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy, as soon as may be, cause such further examinations and surveys to be made as in his opinion are necessary for ascertaining the fitness and relative advantages or disadvantages of a place in the said Narragansett bay for a naval establishment, yard, and depot, on shore, and the best location therefor in said bay, with estimates of probable expense; and that said estimates, and the reports of said examinations and surveys, when made, and all such evidence as is now, or may then be, in possession of his Department, as to such fitness or advantages or disadvantages, be by the Secretary communicated to Congress as soon as may be, with such views and opinions as he may deem important.

Resolved further, That for carrying this resolution into effect, there be now appropriated, and there is hereby appropriated, a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Objection being made, they were not received.

The several committees were then called on for reports, of which an account will be found at the close of the proceedings.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, from the Committee on the National Library, presented the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That one copy of the catalogue of the Library of Congress be presented to each of the incorporated Universities, Colleges, Athenæums, Historical Societies, and American Antiquarian Society in the United States, not exceeding 300 in number.

NEGROES OF THE AMISTAD.

Mr. ADAMS, from the select committee appointed to examine and report whether the documents presented to the House on this subject have been falsified in the translation from the Spanish, made the following report:

The select committee appointed on the 10th inst. with liberty to send for persons and papers, to ascertain and report to the House whether the printed House document of the last session, No. 185, has been falsified, materially differing from the manuscript document transmitted by the President of the United States, and if so, by whom the said falsification was made, respectfully report—

That a material alteration has been made from the manuscript transmitted by the President to the House, by the substitution in the printed document of the word sound for the word ladino, in the manuscript, in the translation, at page 48 of the printed document, of a paper purporting to be a passport for 49 slaves, belonging to J. Ruiz, and by the substitution of the same word sound for the word ladino, in the translation at the 49th page of the printed document, of a paper purporting to be a passport for three slaves belonging to P. Montez.

That this substitution was in both cases made by John H. Trenholm, the proof reader at the office of Messrs. Blair and Rives, the Printers of the House.

The committee submit herewith the testimony taken by them in performance of the duty assigned to them by the House, and in which will be seen the reasons adduced by Mr. Trenholm for making these alterations. And they have instructed their chairman to move that they be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

J. Q. ADAMS.

The report was laid on the table, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

The following, offered by Mr. BARNARD some days ago, came up in order:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury do make to this House a report to the following effect, viz:

1. A statement showing the aggregate revenue which accrued to the Government from customs, from lands, and under the head of what is usually denominated "miscellaneous," in the years 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, estimating for the last quarter of the latter year; and showing also the aggregate expenditures during the same years, estimating for the last quarter of 1840, excluding all payments on account of the redemption of Treasury notes, and also all payments on account of trust funds, except so far as such funds have failed to produce the full amount of interest or annuity actually paid on account of them. The statement to show the general balance between such revenue and expenditures for the whole period.

2. A statement showing the sources from which money has been derived to the Treasury, within the four years above mentioned, and the amount from each source, with the aggregate; estimating for amounts received or receivable in the last quarter of 1840. This statement to include the sum actually received in the Treasury after setting apart the original amount for deposit with the States under the deposit act of 1836; the amount of the fourth instalment of deposit money under that act which was finally retained in the Treasury; the amount of trust or indemnity funds (if any) received and not invested; the amount of Treasury notes which will be outstanding on the 1st of January, 1841, with the interest accrued on them; the amount received on old duty bonds, the payment of which had been postponed; the amount received on bonds for the sale of the stock of the United States in the late Bank of the United States; and the amount received from various banks which suspended in 1837. This statement to show how much, if any, of these moneys remain, or will be in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, 1841.

3. A statement (as far as the same is known, or can be readily ascertained) showing in what cases, if any, and to what extent and pecuniary amount, public works have been or will be carried on, or services rendered in behalf of the Government, under appropriations of the present year, or of past years, during the year 1840, (except under the Post Office Department,) in regard to which any special agreement or understanding whatever exists that the payment therefor should not be called for, and should not be made in the year 1840, or until after the 4th day of March, 1841.

4. A statement showing what will be the probable amount out of the new and permanent appropriations, as exhibited in the estimates of the Secretary of the 7th and 8th December instant, for the year 1841, which will remain unexpended or uncalled for at the close of the year 1841.

5. A statement showing the amounts which will be required to purchase stock, or make investments, for or in behalf of Indians or Indian tribes, pursuant to any treaty or other stipulation other than such as may have been estimated for by the Secretary in his report of the 7th December instant.

6. A statement showing more particularly than appears from his report of the 7th December instant, how much the expenses of 1841 will fall below those of 1840, on account of each of the following particulars, namely: because "the pensions have diminished by death;" because "fewer Indians remain to be removed;" because "several expensive public buildings have been mostly finished;" and because "hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close."

7. A statement showing the amount of claims now pending in the Department, growing out of the Florida war, or relations with Indians, or otherwise, whether such claims have been considered or passed upon or not, with the probable or proximate amount, in the aggregate, of such claims which will become a charge upon the Treasury, as nearly as the Secretary is able to ascertain or to judge thereof, with the means he has, or can readily command.

Mr. B. after making some modifications thereto, was proceeding to censure the Secretary of the Treasury as guilty of deception, &c. when

Mr. ALBERT SMITH moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day; which motion was agreed to.

So the House proceeded to the orders of the day, being the consideration of business on the SPEAKER'S table.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, transmitting additional correspondence in relation to the BURNING OF THE CAROLINE.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I think proper to communicate to the House of Representatives in further answer to their resolution of the 21st ultimo, the correspondence which has since occurred between the Secretary of State and the British Minister on the same subject.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, January 2, 1841.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, December 29, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th instant, in which, in reply to a letter which I had addressed to you on the 13th, you acquaint me that the President is not prepared to comply with my demand for the liberation of Mr. Alexander McLeod of Upper Canada, now imprisoned at Lockport, in the State of New York, on a pretended charge of murder and arson, as having been engaged in the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, on the 29th of December, 1837.

I learn with deep regret that such is the decision of the President of the United States; and I cannot but foresee the very grave and serious consequences that must ensue, if, besides the injury already inflicted upon Mr. McLeod, of a vexatious and unjust imprisonment, any further harm may be done to him in the progress of this extraordinary proceeding.

I have lost no time in forwarding to her Majesty's Government in England, the correspondence that has taken place, and I shall await the further orders of her Majesty's Government with respect to the important question which that correspondence involves.

But I feel it my duty not to close this communication without likewise testifying my vast regret and surprise at the expressions which I find repeated in your letter with reference to the destruction of the steamboat Caroline. I had confidently hoped that the first erroneous impressions of the character of that event, imposed upon the mind of the United States Government by partial and exaggerated representations, would, long since, have been effaced by a more strict and accurate examination of the facts. Such an investigation must even yet, I am willing to believe, lead the United States Government to the same conviction with which her Majesty's authorities on the spot were impressed, that the act was one, in the strictest sense, of self-defence, rendered absolutely necessary by the circumstances of the occasion, for the safety and protection of her Majesty's subjects, and justified by the same motives and principles which, upon similar and well known occasions, have governed the conduct of illustrious officers of the United States. The steamboat Caroline was a hostile vessel, engaged in piratical war against her Majesty's people; hired from her owners for that express purpose, and known to be so beyond the possibility of doubt. The place where it was destroyed was nominally, it is true, within the territory of a friendly power; but the friendly power had been deprived, through overbearing, piratical violence, of the use of its proper authority over that portion of territory. The authorities of New York had not even been able to prevent the artillery of the State from being carried off publicly at midday, to be used as instruments of war against her Majesty's subjects. It was under such circumstances, which, it is to be hoped, will never recur, that the vessel was attacked by a party of her Majesty's people, captured, and destroyed. A remonstrance against the act in question has been addressed by the United States to her Majesty's Government in England. I am not authorized to pronounce the decision of her Majesty's Government upon that remonstrance; but I have felt myself bound to record, in the mean time, the above opinion, in order to protest in the most solemn manner against the spirited and loyal conduct of her Majesty's officers and people being qualified, through an unfortunate misapprehension, as I believe, of the facts, with the appellation of outrage or of murder.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Dec. 31, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 29th inst. in reply to mine of the 26th, on the subject of the arrest and detention of Alexander McLeod as one of the perpetrators of the outrage committed in New York when the steamboat Caroline was seized and burnt. Full evidence of that outrage has been presented to her Britannic Majesty's Government, with a demand for redress, and of course no discussion of the circumstances here, can be either useful or proper; nor can I suppose it to be your desire to invite it. I take leave of this subject with this single remark, that the opinion so strongly expressed by you on the facts and principles involved in the demand for reparation on her Majesty's Government by the United States, would hardly have been hazarded, had you been possessed of the carefully collected testimony which has been presented to your Government in support of that demand.

I avail myself of the occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the message, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that five thousand extra copies be printed.

Mr. F. before he resumed his seat, wished to make a few observations in relation to the communication from the Minister of Great Britain, and in regard to the facts as stated by that functionary in connection with the outrage upon the steamboat Caroline.

That boat, said Mr. F. as I am informed on good authority, belonged to a man in the city of Buffalo named William Wells, who was, and is now, considered a very peaceable and respectable citizen of that city. The boat did not belong to the "Patriots," or the insurgents of Canada, nor was it in any way whatever under their control or authority. This being the case, he could not conceive why the appellation bestowed upon it by the Minister of Great Britain could have been given. There was no reason for it. Yet, said Mr. F. he has thought proper to call the boat a piratical vessel, in the employ of those persons denominated Canadian Patriots.

Mr. F. then proceeded to state what he maintained were the real facts in relation to the burning of the Caroline, which were as follows:

Mr. Wells, at the time the insurgents were in the occupation of Navy Island, in Niagara river, on the Canadian side, was then in the city of Buffalo, twenty miles above. He then applied to the custom-house authorities for permission to run a boat, as a ferry boat, from Schlosser across to Navy Island. Permission being given, the Caroline commenced running, simply as a ferry boat, being totally unarmed, and having no connection with the insurgents. Neither did the boat carry any arms or munitions of war of any kind to those on Navy Island, but was engaged merely in the carrying of passengers. After making several trips, the boat was at night safely moored and secured within the wharf on the American side—not within the "nominal" territory of the United States, but within the undoubted territory of this Government; as much so, said Mr. F. as this hall, in which we are now assembled, is in the territory of the United States. After being thus safely moored at the wharf in our territory, it was left in the charge of a watch, unarmed, and without any arms whatever being on board, except a single pocket pistol, not loaded. Well, while the boat was thus lying within our territory, it was attacked in the night by an armed force from Canada, sent, as it now appears, by the authority of her Majesty. One man was murdered, others injured, the boat then set on fire, turned adrift, and sent over the falls. This was the "arson" complained of; this was the "murder" complained of. One of our citizens was attacked, unarmed, and had his brains knocked out; and there was every reason to believe that others were killed, or so injured as to be unable to leave the vessel before it went over the falls.

Now, by the laws of the State of New York, said Mr. F. this was murder, and nothing less than murder; and the perpetrators, on being apprehended, would be tried by the laws of that State for the crime. It was a matter pertaining to the State; and neither this Government, nor the Executive of the Government, could have any control over it, unless, indeed, the Government of Great Britain should see fit to repeal its present law, and, entering into treaty stipulations, make laws which should be truly applicable to the case. If so, Mr. F. was understood to say, the matter might perhaps be compromised. But, apart from that, if the same spirit was manifested by the powers at home as was exhibited by the British minister here in relation to this matter, he, Mr. F. conceived that the necessary consequences of the conviction of McLeod would be serious indeed.

Mr. F. said he had no doubt but that McLeod would be put upon his trial, when he sincerely hoped he would be found innocent. But if he should be found guilty, he had no doubt but that he would be executed, unless, indeed, a force much larger than common should be brought from the Canada side to his rescue.

Mr. T. concluded by showing that his reason for making these remarks was to show that there was a false impression entertained by Mr. Fox in regard to the facts of the case.

M. PICKENS hoped the House would at once consent to the printing of the message and documents, and their reference without further debate to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He hoped so, because there was a delicate negotiation pending on another question with the same power, and which question was exciting intense interest, not only in that section of the country, but to the whole Union. The excited state of the public mind, and a number of other reasons, induced him to hope that the matter would be permitted to go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with as little ceremony as possible.

Mr. UNDERWOOD did not rise for the purpose of objecting to a reference of the message and documents to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but to object to the printing of the five thousand extra copies. He was in favor of a reference to the committee, because the principles involved in the communications between Messrs. Fox and Forsyth, were, to his mind, very great and important. He wished the Committee on Foreign Affairs to make a report on those great principles, giving an exposition of them, which might be printed, and go forth to the American people, as showing the rule by which we intended to abide. When such a report should be made, then the gentleman from New York might print as many extra copies as he chose.

What are those principles, asked Mr. U. Why it is averred by the British Minister, that in a time of profound peace, an officer of another country, by the order of his Government, may commit an outrage within our territory, and destroy the lives of our citizens, and yet he is not amenable to our laws for murder. This was asserted on the principle of international law; and if we so considered it, we must necessarily bring it within the case laid down by the British Minister. But to do that, it was necessary that the order should come from the supreme executive authority of Great Britain to justify the act. But had we seen any order to that effect? So far as he was informed, no such order had been given. On the contrary, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Cushing,] observed, a few days ago, that Lord Palmerston has observed silence to this day on the subject. That being the case, we had no right to take it for granted that the order for the outrage in question had come from the supreme Executive authority of Great Britain.

He, Mr. U. was inclined to think, that if any inferior officer of the army or navy, in the service of Great Britain, should, without instruction from the supreme executive authority, perpetrate such outrages, he would, in every sense of the word, be a murderer. He asked the Committee on Foreign Affairs to turn their attention to this point, and to give an exposition of international law, which ought to be spread before the American people for examination, with a view to this or any other altercation which might occur between us and that nation.

Besides this, there were other questions involved in these papers. There was the question as to the right of jurisdiction between the States and the General Government, in relation to matters of this kind. On this point he would be glad to have the Committee on Foreign Affairs direct their attention.

This transaction had occurred at a time when there were no treaty stipulations between us and Great Britain providing for such an occurrence. Now as this was a past affair, occurring when no treaty stipulations did exist, he was not prepared to say that treaty stipulations could now have an ex post facto operation to draw it from the jurisdiction of the State of New York to that of the General Government, and thereby prevent the authority of that State from punishing the murderer.

Mr. U. was inclined to deny that the Constitution of the United States would justify a treaty made subsequent to the fact, so as to take away the State jurisdiction. But whatever might grow out of this matter, he thought it highly necessary that we should take a firm and decided stand. It would not be proper for us to bully or to threaten Great Britain, but neither would it be proper for us to tamely submit to aggression. And if the conflict did come, he, for one, would be for owning the mouths of all streams whose source was in our territory.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, in a very indignant manner, protested against the tone of the letter of the British Minister, and asked if it was come to this, that we were to crouch to Great Britain. From the position of Mr. D. his remarks were mostly inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. WELLER said, it appeared to him that the subject had been sufficiently discussed. If it were prolonged, it might, to be sure, afford an opportunity for gentlemen to display their patriotism. But this, in his opinion, was not the proper time. Therefore, believing that no good could result from further debate, and the House having had a specimen of the patriotism of its members, he, Mr. W. would move the previous question.

At the request of Mr. GRANGER, the motion for the previous question was withdrawn.

Mr. GRANGER wished to say one word in relation to the feeling which existed in this matter. He wished to state that McLeod would have a fair and impartial trial, and have every advantage which the laws of the State of New York secured to him. His trial would be as cool and dispassionate as if the murder had been committed by a citizen of New York on the body of another citizen of that State. When that trial should take place, he, Mr. G. hoped the man would be acquitted; but if found guilty, he would surely be condemned; and if condemned, would most assuredly be executed, as due to the supremacy of the laws of the State. And, said Mr. G. should the British Government, in a moment of rashness, commence hostilities for the supposed wrong, she would find in the citizens of Western New York the same blood as in 1812; she would find men who were neither to be bought by British gold, nor by British influence, and only to be bought by their love of country. He for one had no fears that this nation would ever crouch to the British lion. She would calmly and dispassionately execute the laws of her several States, and it need not be feared that either this Government or the States would ever quail.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. G. then renewed the call for the previous question, which was seconded by the House.

The question then being put on the motion to refer, was decided in the affirmative. So the message, with the documents, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Hendricks.

BILLS ON THEIR THIRD READING.

The bill for the relief of Clemens, Bryan and Company;

The bill for the relief of the Plumb Island Bridge and Turnpike Company;

The bill for the relief of John Moore; and

The bill in addition to an act for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay; were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill to refund to Noah Miller, and others, a part of the proceeds of the sale of the British sloop Mary, and cargo, which were captured by them, and libelled and sold for the benefit of the United States, was, after some remarks by Mr. HUBBARD, laid on the table for the present.

The bill making compensation to the State of New Hampshire for the services of her militia, coming up on its third reading—

Mr. CRITTENDEN desired some explanation respecting this bill—he desired to know what act of hostility had justified the expenditure here claimed.

Mr. PIERCE said he had hoped that this bill was to encounter no further opposition, and he trusted still that it might find favor even with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] From 1790, when the first settlement of that portion of the State of New Hampshire known by the name of Indian Stream, was made, down to 1832-3, no question of jurisdiction was ever raised—it was exercised by the State uninterruptedly. Afterwards, by arrangement between this Government and that of Great Britain, the long pending controversy between the two countries, in relation to the North-eastern boundary, was submitted to the arbitration of the King of the Netherlands, who decided in favor of Great Britain; and thus took from New Hampshire a considerable portion of her territory, over which she had exercised unquestioned jurisdiction from the earliest history of its settlement. This award, it was well known, after considerable time had elapsed, was set aside by the United States and Great Britain. Whatever doubt might at any time have existed in relation to the true boundary on that border, in consequence of the imperfect geographical knowledge and inaccuracy of maps of that wild and unfrequented country in its early history, he felt warranted in asserting that there could, with present lights, be no doubt in relation to the jurisdiction of New Hampshire. In 1835, '36, at the period of these difficulties, her right there was as clear as it was in the counties of Merrimack and Rockingham.

The state of things in that territory which made it necessary for the Executive of New Hampshire to call out the military force, was produced by the course pursued by the Federal Government, in its negotiations with Great Britain, over which the State of New Hampshire could, of course, exercise no control. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] desired to know more particularly on what ground the State claimed this remuneration—if there had been any invasion of her territory—what was the necessity that warranted calling out the military force—what was the extent of that force, and what would probably be the expense to the General Government, should the bill become a law? Now he (Mr. PIERCE) would with great pleasure give such information as he possessed upon the subject.

Doubts having been temporarily cast upon the question of jurisdiction by the award of the King of the Netherlands—the action of the Federal Government and its negotiations, and the civil authorities of the State and Province of Lower Canada came in conflict, and bodies of armed men were found opposed to each other in support of the judicial process issued by the officers of their respective Governments. The difficulties on the border were thickening. A deputy of the sheriff of the county of Coos attempted to arrest an individual in the Indian Stream territory, by the name of Tyler, and with the aid of two men, Blanchard and Harvy, succeeded Tyler, however, was promptly rescued by force from Smith's custody. Immediately after this, a warrant was issued by a person claiming to be a magistrate of Lower Canada, in the name of the King of Great Britain against the deputy of the sheriff, and Blanchard and Harvey, for attempting to execute process there. By virtue of this warrant, Blanchard was taken from his own dwelling-house by a body of armed men, with the avowed purpose of carrying him into Canada for trial, on the charge of having assisted in serving a writ duly issued by the competent authority of the county of Coos. Blanchard, in his turn, was rescued by American citizens—his neighbors. This assault upon the citizens of Indian Stream by armed men, and the attempt to extend over it the jurisdiction of Lower Canada, was the invasion which, in the judgment of the Governor, made it expedient and necessary to call out the militia, through whose presence further collision was prevented, and the supremacy of the State maintained. These were some of the leading facts in the case, and the State asked reimbursement for the expenses incurred, on the ground that she was sustaining "the jurisdiction of the State and of the United States."

Had a regiment of armed men from the province, instead of the small detachment alluded to, marched upon this defenceless territory, and had they been met by the militia of the State under the order of the Executive, no objection would have been raised to this claim. The Governor, perceiving the point to which things were rapidly tending, sent a military force promptly to the scene, which arrested further hostility, and, by their presence, probably prevented a general border warfare, and the loss, perhaps, of many lives. This boundary question, so long agitated, was under the exclusive control of the Federal Government.

In his judgment, the treaty line should have been asserted years ago, and maintained, if necessary, with all the power of this country—at all events it was the duty of the Federal Government to protect the territory lying within the limits of New Hampshire, and the rights of the citizens upon that territory, from this foreign interference and lawless aggression. And since the State found it necessary to call out its own military force for the purpose, the Federal Government was not the less bound to defray the expense. He then referred particularly to an elaborate report upon the subject, made to the House of Representatives in 1839 by Mr. HOWARD, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN was not satisfied yet that there had been any invasion of the country. There had only been some little controversy with trespassers who were presuming to act under different authority, and the State of New Hampshire had done nothing more than her duty in putting an end to the trespass; but she might have done it by civil process, and it was the duty of the military power to aid the civil power in the service of such process.

Mr. HUBBARD said, as he understood the Senator from Kentucky, that gentleman said there had been no invasion of the territory. Now, since the treaty of peace, the territory in question had always been occupied as part of the territory of New Hampshire; in fact, since 1790, Hall's stream was considered the northwestern branch of the Connecticut river, and that stream was distinctly marked as the boundary line between the provinces of Canada and New Hampshire. But, after the King of the Netherlands made his award, the British authorities in Canada undertook to exercise authority between that boundary stream and Indian stream; and it was to expel these intruders that the Governor of New Hampshire had found it necessary to call out the militia at an expense of $6,000. This was necessary to the exercise of jurisdiction both by the State and the United States. The State of New Hampshire was interrupted in her peaceable occupancy of that territory, and it became necessary, to maintain their jurisdiction, that the steps should be taken which were resorted to. There was, he believed, no actual loss of lives in the defence of this territory, or of their jurisdiction over it, but that would not change the merits of the question.

Mr. CRITTENDEN did not dispute the right of New Hampshire to this territory; but there had been no invasion—there had been nothing more than a resistance to the service of legal process, and not by citizens of Canada alone, but of New Hampshire herself; for there was but one Canadian who presumed to act as a Canadian officer—a Canadian justice of the peace, who presumed to issue his warrant for execution on the territory. Did that, then, justify the calling out of the militia, and the making the General Government answerable for the expense? He was glad the amount was but small; it was the principle only which he here wished to be settled; his anxiety was to vindicate American rights and the rights of her territories, but it did seem to him that there must be some limit fixed to these otherwise unbounded rights of the States and the Territories. Here there was not a man with arms in his hands, so far as he understood the statement of the honorable Senators—there was nothing more than what amounted, technically, to a mere trespass by an individual who might have been more cheaply punished by the civil power.

Mr. HUBBARD said it became indispensably necessary to call out the military force of New Hampshire to maintain her jurisdiction over this tract of country, which had been invaded in consequence of the act of the General Government. Who referred that question to the King of the Netherlands, by whose award the boundary line of the State was disturbed? Was it New Hampshire? From the time of the treaty of peace, there had been no question about it; but this Government took the question in hand and referred it to the King of the Netherlands to determine where the State line ran, and on that subject the King of the Netherlands made his award, and then the British undertook to take possession of that tract of country. What, then, was New Hampshire to do? Was she to permit her citizens to become subject to British authority? Was she to permit Lord Gosford to exercise authority over that territory, and to dispose of so much of the State of New Hampshire to the British Government? He (Mr. HUBBARD) should like to know what she should have done? Here was a large tract of their territory, and how were they to get possession of it, if an order had been given to march a King's regiment into it? Why, they should have called out their militia to expel the invaders, and they would clearly have been entitled to come to the General Government for the repayment of the expense incurred. And where, then, was the difference? The moment the King of the Netherlands decided upon a different boundary line, the British assumed to exercise authority over it, and to deny the authority of New Hampshire. What, then, were they to do but that which they had done, and which was made necessary to be done, in consequence of the act of the General Government; and the only difference was, that, because a King's regiment was not ordered upon this territory, and because there had been no bloodshed, New Hampshire was not to be remunerated for the expense incurred. That was not done; but civil jurisdiction was exercised over the territory by Great Britain; and to reassert their boundary, which was as well defined as the road to the President's House, it was found necessary to call out their militia, and since that had been done, they had been in the peaceable possession of the territory. Under these circumstances, it was for the Senate to decide whether the State of New Hampshire should be reimbursed the unavoidable expense which she incurred in consequence of the act of the General Government.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky would like to have some further opportunity to examine this case. There were one or two questions which suggested themselves to his mind: whether there had been an actual invasion of this territory by a foreign power was one; and if not, was there a threatened invasion, or imminent danger of an invasion? And then there was another question: supposing there was a threatened invasion, was there time to apply to the General Government to repel this threatened invasion? for to the General Government belonged the decision whether there should be peace or war. No case less than one of extreme urgency would justify the State authorities in deciding on a question of a threatened invasion, and incurring an expense which perhaps the General Government might not think proper. It seemed to him (Mr. CLAY) that it was proper to ascertain all these facts: had there been a military invasion? had there been a threatened invasion? and if so, what had New Hampshire done under the circumstances? Would it not be extending to the State authorities the power of the General Government, if there was time to communicate with the General Government, if, without the countenance of the General Government, they undertook to engage in a conflict with another power? All these matters were worthy of inquiry; and therefore, he would suggest the propriety of laying the bill for the present on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD, in the mean time, would refer Senators for information to a report made by Mr. HOWARD, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the House in January, 1839.

Mr. CLAY said he would take an opportunity to examine it.

The bill was then laid on the table.

The bill making compensation to the State of Maine for the services of her militia, was read a third time and passed.

GENERAL PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, and amendments thereto were offered by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, CRITTENDEN, TAPPAN, PORTER, and PRENTISS, which gave rise to an extended debate.

At 4 o'clock, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, Jan. 5, 1841.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, viz:

1. From the Governor of the State of Missouri, transmitting a copy of an act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled "An act for ascertaining and settling the northern boundary line of the State of Missouri."

Referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

2. From the Post Office Department, transmitting, in obedience to the 21st section of an act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government, approved 9th May, 1836, a statement of the disbursements made from the contingent fund of the Post Office Department from the 1st January to the 31st of December, 1840.

Referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures, and ordered to be printed.

3. From the Post Office Department, in pursuance of the 25th section of the act of the 2d of July, 1836, transmitting a copy of the abstract of the offers for carrying the mails, made within the year preceding the 1st July, 1840.

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALVARY MORRIS offered a resolution making provision for the lunatics in the Washington county jail.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said that the Committee for the District of Columbia had already reported a bill upon this subject, and it was now upon the SPEAKER's table.

Mr. HUBBARD asked whether there was not a county police to attend to such matters, as there was in other counties.

Mr. MORRIS remarked that it was only necessary to visit the prison, to see that something ought to be done.

Mr. JOHNSON observed that the Committee for the District of Columbia had, in the bill to which he had just alluded, authorized the marshal for the District to send to the Lunatic Asylum in Baltimore, all such persons as are now confined in the jails of Washington and Alexandria, and all such as may hereafter be committed as lunatics, at the expense of the United States.

Mr. MORRIS then withdrew his resolution.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION

The SPEAKER then announced as the special order, the consideration of the following resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections, at the last session of Congress, declaring Mr. NAYLOR to have been duly elected as a Representative for the third Congressional District of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That CHARLES NAYLOR was duly elected a member of the House of Representatives for the 26th Congress, from the Third Congressional District in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MEDILL thought it no more than just that the other claimant, Mr. INGERSOLL, should also have leave to address the house on the subject. He therefore asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner, CHARLES J. INGERSOLL, be permitted to appear at the bar, and that he, as well as the sitting member, have leave to address this House on the subject of the contested election from the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania.

The question being then taken on this resolution it was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS wished to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution had just been agreed to. If Mr. INGERSOLL came here as a claimant for the seat in question, he (Mr. W.) would have no objection to his being heard at the bar. But he understood that Mr. INGERSOLL did not claim a right to the seat. That being the case, it was a question with him whether Mr. INGERSOLL had a rightful claim to the privileges accorded by the resolution. Mr. W. concluded by moving a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Mr. MEDILL said that by a reference to the files of the House, it would be seen that besides petitions from a large portion of citizens of the 3rd Congressional District of Pennsylvania, a petition had been presented by Mr. INGERSOLL himself, setting forth that he was a candidate at the election and that it was his firm conviction, if justice were done, that he would be placed in the seat now occupied by Mr. NAYLOR. That matter was referred by the House to the Committee of Elections; and a few days before the close of the last session, two reports were made from that committee—one from the majority, and the other from the minority. One report stated that the sitting member was entitled to his seat, and the other report set forth that he had been elected by fraud. This committee discharged its duty by presenting their views, and by taking all the testimony they could in the case. It now, therefore, remained with the House to decide which of the reports was correct. But, in the face of all this, would the gentleman undertake to say that Mr. INGERSOLL had withdrawn from his claim? He (Mr. M.) had seen nothing whatever which could justify such a belief. He had seen nothing in the public press to that effect, neither had he heard the least intimation of it from any quarter. But, moreover, Mr. INGERSOLL was now present in the House, ready to claim his seat.

Mr. FILLMORE desired that the latter portion of the report of the minority of the committee might be read. It was read accordingly.

Mr. F. after some preliminary remarks, proceeded to argue that any person contesting the right of a member to a seat, had a right to be heard. He contended that the right to be heard did not result from the fact of a man being a candidate or not. The proper course would be to grant Mr. INGERSOLL a hearing, when he presumed he would be able to enlighten them on the subject as to whether he considered himself a claimant to the seat or not. He (Mr. F.) was in favor of granting a hearing to Mr. INGERSOLL, on the simple ground of his appearing to contest the right of the sitting member; and it did not make any difference whether the contestant made any claim to the seat himself or not. He (Mr. F.) would vote against the reconsideration.

Mr. BRIGGS hoped the resolution would not be reconsidered. He considered it would be manifest injustice to refuse a hearing to any man who came here to contest a seat with a member who might be in that seat. In his opinion Mr. INGERSOLL had an undoubted right to urge his claim at the bar of the House.

Mr. MASON was in favor of the resolution, and hoped it would not be reconsidered. He was in favor of granting every contestant to a seat on that floor, a fair hearing. He desired that Mr. INGERSOLL might be heard, as he was desirous of knowing whether the gentleman claimed a seat in the House by virtue of his election, or whether he appeared only as counsel for the people of Pennsylvania, as contesting the right of the sitting member.

Mr. CUSHING said he was also in favor of hearing the petitioner for the reasons stated by the gentleman from Ohio, and also from the reasons on which the petition was based. Mr. INGERSOLL, in his petition presented to the House, at the last session, claimed the seat now occupied by Mr. NAYLOR. That was the record, and the present proceedings was but a continuation of that record. The question was, therefore, what disposition should be made of the memorial of Mr. INGERSOLL. But he, Mr. C. had risen for the purpose of objecting to the form of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MEDILL.] That resolution asked that "Mr. INGERSOLL should have leave to address the House, as well as the sitting member." Now he, Mr. C. contended that Mr. NAYLOR, at the sitting member, was a member de facto, and as such he had as much right to address the House, as the gentleman from Ohio himself, or any other member. In this view of the case he considered the adoption of the resolution as implying a doubt on the right of Mr. NAYLOR, and admitting that he was not a member de facto. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio would amend his resolution, so as to leave out that portion.

Mr. MEDILL did not perceive that the resolution implied a denial of the right of the sitting member. It merely asked that the petitioner might be heard as well as the sitting member. It merely asked that Mr. INGERSOLL might be placed on the same footing as Mr. NAYLOR. He therefore saw no necessity for amending the resolution as required by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He hoped the gentleman would not press it, inasmuch they were losing much time, and Mr. INGERSOLL was present waiting to be heard.

Mr. CUSHING said he would press it: for, if the words meant nothing, why not omit them; and if they did mean any thing, their import was a hard one.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS complained that the House, by giving the Committee of Elections power to send for persons and papers, had made them the prosecutors, instead of the judges; and he would always contend that the proceedings of the House were improper and irregular. But he wished to know whether Mr. INGERSOLL intended to appear as a claimant to the seat, or as attorney for the people. It was with a view of ascertaining this fact, that he had moved the reconsideration. As, however, many of his friends appeared desirous he should withdraw, he would do so. Mr. W. then withdrew the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CUSHING renewed it, as he could not consent to the resolution until the words he objected to were stricken out.

Mr. MEDILL said that in order to save time, he would consent to amend the resolution as desired.

And there being no objection, the resolution was so modified.

After some further debate, in which Messrs. BARNARD, MEDILL, G. DAVIS, and ALFORD, participated,

Mr. HUBBARD moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. ALFORD, who, after some remarks in reply to Mr. BARNARD, renewed it.

Some debate of a desultory character here arose as to whether Mr. ALFORD, having previously spoken, had a right to the floor to move the previous question.

Mr. TURNEY having obtained the floor, after some brief remarks on the propriety of reserving the merits of the case until it should be fairly before the House, moved the previous question.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON called for the reading of the memorial of Mr. INGERSOLL; which was read as follows:

To the honorable the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

The memorial and petition of Charles J. Ingersoll respectfully shows:

That he was chosen by a majority of the electors of the Third Congressional District of the State of Pennsylvania, their Representative in and for the Twenty-sixth Congress, now in session, and accordingly so returned as elected by the constitutional authorities of the State of Pennsylvania, whose certificates, in legal form, here communicated to the House of Representatives, and are now among its records, certifying that your memorialist and petitioner is so elected. He had believed, therefore, that your honorable House would, before this time, without his application, have instituted the proper means for ascertaining whether he is entitled to the membership, which is claimed also by another person. But inasmuch as he is given to understand that a direct application, in the form of a petition, from himself, is deemed necessary to bring the subject, without delay, into the consideration of your honorable House, your petitioner respectfully requests that prompt and proper measures may be taken by the House of Representatives, to enable your petitioner to prove his right to membership as Representative of the people of the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania in the present Congress, and that no other person is elected from that district to this Congress.

C. J. INGERSOLL.

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1840.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question—being on the reconsideration—ordered to be put.

Mr. BARNARD demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Breckenridge, Brockway, Chittenden, Cranston, Edward Davies, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Doe,

So the House refused to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of Mr. MEDILL had been agreed to.

The SPEAKER then directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to apprise Mr. INGERSOLL that he might appear at the bar of the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL then presented himself at the bar. Whereupon,

The SPEAKER informed him that in pursuance of an order of the House, he (Mr. I.) was permitted to state his reasons for claiming a seat in the House, as a representative from the third Congressional district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. INGERSOLL then proceeded to recapitulate the facts on which he based his right to the seat, and entered into a detailed account of the circumstances attending the perpetration of the alleged frauds, the bribery of witnesses, etc.

Without concluding, Mr. I. gave way for a motion to adjourn; and at a few minutes past three o'clock,

The House adjourned.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, reported a bill confirming the claim of the heirs of Pierre Dolet, deceased, to a tract of land in Louisiana; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that when the bill establishing a general bankrupt law was taken up, he would move to amend it by subjecting banks and money corporations to the operation of the bill, and the compulsory provisions of the bill.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill for the relief of Mary Prettyman was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the benefit of the Howard Institution of the city of Washington was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. TAPPAN inquired from the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia whether this was the same bill as passed the Senate the last session.

Mr. MERRICK. The same.

Mr. TAPPAN would call for the ayes and noes thereon.

Several Senators asked for some explanation of the bill.

Mr. MERRICK said the memorial to the Senate from respectable inhabitants of the District, set forth the objects of this bill—which were of a purely benevolent character—and therefore he would ask that it might be read.

The Secretary having read the memorial,

Mr. TAPPAN said he questioned not that the institution which it was proposed to establish in this city, for which aid was sought by this bill, was a very meritorious and a very charitable institution; but he had yet to learn that they had any more power, or authority, or right, to grant the public property to maintain a charitable institution in the city of Washington, than they had to support a similar institution in the city of New York, New Orleans, or any other city or town of the United States. Because this was the seat of Government, because Congress sits here, and the public offices were here, were they to put themselves in the place of the inhabitants, and, by their liberality, afford the city the means of performing acts of charity, which in all other places were accomplished by the means and the private charities of the citizens themselves? If the chairman of the Committee on the District would give some further explanation, he (Mr. TAPPAN) should be glad to hear it, for at present he had learned nothing that was satisfactory. He was not aware that they were under any obligation to support the poor of this District, more than their general obligation to do good to the poor all over the country.

Mr. MERRICK had hoped the memorial itself would have been satisfactory. The gentleman from Ohio admitted that the object of the institution was praiseworthy and commendable, and highly beneficial to the country, but he doubted the right of Congress to give the aid contemplated by the bill, and he argued that Congress had no more right to provide for the poor and the indigent here, than in any other part of the country. Now it seemed to him (Mr. MERRICK) that the Senator from Ohio had not given a correct construction of the powers of Congress. New York had a Government of her own, whose duty it was to take care of the local interests of the people of that State, while the people of the District of Columbia looked to Congress as their exclusive legislators; there was no power except that which resides here, and unless that power was exercised, the people of the District were cut off entirely. The members of Congress were the exclusive rulers of the District, and to Congress must the people of the District look for the exercise of sovereign power. Was it right and proper, then, that the people of the District should be completely disfranchised and cut off from all political rights which were enjoyed by the people generally, and that Congress should be less beneficent than the Legislatures of other States? The authority of Congress over this people was special and more comprehensive than over the other people of the States; Congress occupied the place of a local Legislature; and they were not asked to apply the national money to aid the people of the District—they were not asked to take the money of the people of New York, or of Maryland, or of Ohio, but they were asked to give to the people of the District a portion of the property which belonged to them, which Congress obtained by grant from the owners of the soil, for the purpose of being applied to the promotion of the welfare of the people of the District. What consideration had the people of the United States ever given for this vast amount of property? This spot was selected as the seat of the Federal Government—choice was made of this place because it was convenient, and the proprietors of the soil ceded to Congress the territory, and now all that was asked, was to give them back a small portion for a highly beneficent object, of that which was as much the property of the people of the District as the land within a State was the property of the people of the State.

Mr. HUBBARD had been much surprised at the argument of the Senator from Maryland. Did they owe any thing to the District? If they did, he should like to see the amount stated, that he might ascertain the amount of balance due from the Government to the District of Columbia. He knew not what right they had to take the property of the Government and convey it for the benefit of any portion of the people. He had yet to learn that they had the power, or, if they had the power, that there would be a propriety in exercising that power. True they were the exclusive Legislature of the District; but were they then to provide for the support of the poor? Was such power conferred upon them? They had given corporate and municipal powers to the several cities of the District, and beyond that they could not go. With reference to the account between Government and the District, which had been often alluded to, he repeated that he should like to see it stated. The Senator from Maryland was greatly in error if he supposed if the value of the property was taken into account, there would be a balance in favor of the city. What would this property have been worth, if the National Government had not been located here? If this land were taken as now proposed, it would be the taking of the national property and giving it to the city, and he (Mr. HUBBARD) denied that they had such power. They might as well take from the national fund and appropriate it to the use of the State of New Hampshire as to take this property for the use of this institution; and with these views he should vote against the bill.

Mr. MERRICK had merely adverted to the manner Congress had acquired the title to the District, to show that there was a peculiar relation existing between Congress and the people of the District. As to the matter of account, of which the Senator from New Hampshire had spoken, he had no intention to enter into a discussion. They were not now asked for any thing from the National Treasury; they were merely asked for that which was placed at their disposal for the benefit of the people.

Mr. SEVIER had voted against this bill at the last session, and he should vote against it again; but he wished to ask the chairman of the Committee on the District how many lots Government held in this city, and what was their value.

Mr. MERRICK said it was impossible that he could now answer the question so unexpectedly proposed; originally, half the property of the city was ceded to the Government, but how much the Government still held he could not tell.

Mr. SEVIER asked how it had been disposed of.

Mr. MERRICK explained. A good deal of it had been disposed of for colleges and schools, and a good deal for the improvement of the streets and public squares. When a street was paved, the Commissioner of the Public Buildings was bound to pave that part which passed along a public square, and for this purpose a good deal of the public lands had been disposed of, the city corporation levying a tax to defray the expense of improving the roads in the front of the stores and habitations.

Mr. SEVIER said if the Senator from Maryland would introduce a bill to cede all the lots to the corporate authorities, for the purpose of giving to each citizen a lot for the site of a "log cabin," he (Mr. SEVIER) would vote for it.

Mr. HUBBARD. Each white person.

Mr. SEVIER. White or black, or between the colors. If the Senator from Maryland would introduce such a bill, giving the public property in the land in this city to the citizen, and add a prospective pre-emption clause for the benefit of those who were to come hereafter in the vacant lots, he would vote for it, and he believed many of those with whom he usually acted would vote for it too.

Mr. MERRICK hoped the Senator from Arkansas would yet become one of the "log cabin" party.

After a few other words from Mr. SEVIER and Mr. MERRICK,

Mr. WALKER said he had voted for this bill at the last session with great pleasure, and should do so again now. The bill granted a small vacant lot of the public grounds in Washington to the Howard Institute of this city, an institute established by private funds for the most noble and charitable purposes—the employment of the poor, especially of the female poor, the widow and the orphan, and the alleviation of human misery. This grant was not without precedent. One of the New England States and one of the Western States had received from Congress large grants of the public domain for similar institutions and for public charity within the limits of those States. These were grants, not of a small lot of ground, as in this case, but of whole townships of public land, greater in extent than the entire District of Columbia. And was human misery less in this District than in New England or the West, that they should refuse to alleviate it here, by all the proper means within the power of this Government? If the Legislature of this Government could not make this grant, no other could; for no other possessed any power in this District. Was this District, then, to be the only portion of this Union where public charity was to receive no legislative aid or encouragement? Here, under their own eyes, and in their daily walks to this Capitol, should they behold so much of human misery, and, folding their arms in callous apathy, say to the poor of this District, "You are strangers to us—you are not our constituents, and we will refuse you even a small lot of the public ground upon which to erect that asylum, for the construction of which, charitable individuals had raised the funds?" He would give no such vote; and if he did, he could not but feel that he was responsible for at least a portion of that distress which exists in this District.

The ayes and noes were then taken, and the question was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Clayton, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Surgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, and Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, Pierce, Smith of Connecticut, and Tappan—7.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SEVIER gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to cede the public lands within the District of Columbia to settlers thereon.

GENERAL PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, and a substitute therefor being submitted by Mr. PRENTISS,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill, and was followed by Messrs. WRIGHT and LINN in reply.

At 4 o'clock, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1841.

Mr. J. W. JONES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill making appropriations for the SUPPORT OF THE ARMY FOR THE YEAR 1841.

It was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

Mr. FILLMORE asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill entitled "An act regulating the taking of testimony in cases of contested election, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, at what time the bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government would be reported by the committee.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said that the bill would be reported in the course of a few days.

Mr. ADAMS remarked that he made the inquiry because the rules of the House required that it should be reported within the first thirty days of the session.

Mr. JONES of Virginia replied that the gentleman from Massachusetts had mistaken the provision of the rule to which he referred. That rule made it the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to report the general appropriation bills—for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government; for the army; for the navy; and for the Indian Department, and Indian annuities, within thirty days after their appointment, and not within thirty days from the commencement of the session. He would inform the honorable gentleman that the bill would be reported within the time prescribed by the rule of the House.

Mr. CHINN gave notice that he would, at an early day, ask leave to introduce a bill, entitled "An act to revive an act entitled an act to authorize the inhabitants of the State of Louisiana to enter the back lands;"

Also, a bill entitled "An act to unite the South Eastern land district, and that of the Greensburgh district, in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes."

Messrs. DOE, CHINN, SMITH of Indiana, RARIDEN and GRINNELL, on leave, severally presented petitions; which were appropriately referred.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, in pursuance of notice heretofore given, introduced "a bill to revive and continue in force for a limited time, an act approved on the 3d day of March, 1837, entitled 'An act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians;' and also an act approved on the 23d day of February, 1838, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of lands under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians;'" which bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, gave notice that he would offer the following amendment to the Army Bill when it should come up for consideration:

"Sec. —. And that the sum of three hundred thousand dollars be appropriated for the continuance of the Cumberland Road through the States of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, to be disbursed equally among said States, and to be subjected to all the restrictions and limitations of former appropriations."

On motion of Mr. D. the amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEONARD, from the Committee on Public Buildings, to whom had been referred a resolution of the House, directing an inquiry as to the cause of the

made a report thereon.

The report was read, and after exculpating the contractor from all blame, concludes as follows:

"Upon inquiry, the Committee find that no money has been paid by the Clerk to the constructors. The remaining materials of the chandelier are valued at $400, which Messrs. Hooper and Co. are willing to take back. In view of all the circumstances, the committee have come to the conclusion to recommend to the House a strict compliance with the contract before referred to, by directing the Clerk to pay over to Messrs. Hooper and Co. such balance as may be coming to them, after deducting the $400 aforesaid. All of which is respectfully submitted."

The report was concurred in, and ordered to be printed.

LUNATICS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. L. WILLIAMS in the chair,) on the bill reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia, on the 22d of December, as follows: A BILL making temporary provision for lunatics in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the marshal for the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized to send to the lunatic asylum, in Baltimore, all such lunatic persons as are now confined in the jails of Washington and Alexandria counties, and all such as may hereafter be considered as lunatics, by order of the circuit or criminal courts; and that he pay the expenses of their removal, and of their maintenance in said asylum, and be allowed for the same in the settlement of his accounts at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CUSHING did not understand why the Corporation of Washington could not take care of their own poor. If the lunatics were paupers, why were they confined in the common jail? There was an alms house in the city, in which they could be confined.

Mr. JOHNSON would answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The reason why the corporate authorities did not place these maniacs among the paupers, was because of the imminent peril that would thereby be occasioned. There were now twelve lunatics in prison with common criminals. The lunatic asylum in Baltimore was willing to receive the lunatics at moderate prices. Common sympathy, said Mr. J. called for relief.

Mr. CUSHING said he had understood that those lunatics were without the common necessities of life, and were obliged to lie upon the prison floor. Mr. C. had been told that the circumstances of the case called on the House for relief. If this bill was the only mode of affording relief, he would perhaps be willing to stretch a point; but he desired to know whose fault it was that the evil existed.

Mr. JOHNSON said that the corporation of this city gave two dollars per week for the support of these lunatics, and that was all it could afford. But in the restoration of their health, their minds might be restored. This was a higher motive than dollars and cents, and this was the motive which had induced the committee to report the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend the bill, by adding the following:

"Provided, That it shall be done at the expense of the city authorities."

Mr. HUBBARD said that, in his opinion, this was a subject which should be left to the authorities of the city. The people's representatives were not there to regulate the poor houses of the District; and it seemed to him that, if the provisions of the bill were carried out, all the poor of surrounding country would come here to profit by it.

Mr. JOHNSON said the bill was not intended for paupers, but for lunatics.

Mr. HUBBARD replied that there could be no difference between them, in the principle of expense.

Mr. JOHNSON remarked that the counties took care of paupers, and the States of lunatics. Congress was the local legislature of the District, and Mr. J. asked whether it would not act its part. The expenses would be trifling in comparison to the comfort which would be bestowed. He trusted that the gentleman from Alabama would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. REED, after some remarks, in which he observed, that from some cause or other the greatest number of lunatics were assembled in this city, said he hoped the amendment would not be agreed to by the House. As, however, the subject of charity had been introduced, he begged to make a few remarks. Mr. R. then in a very earnest manner adverted to the fact that the Marshal of this District had an annual salary of ten thousand dollars, while the persons in the jail were in the most wretched condition, lying upon straw, and subject to many other privations. He, Mr. R. believed that, before the session of the District, the State of Maryland allowed fifteen shillings as the price of board for each individual. He trusted the committee would take this subject under consideration, and see whether they could not provide by law much better living and accommodation for these criminals, even though it should be at a reduction of the salary of the Marshal, who, it appeared, lived two miles off, and, while deriving a great profit, employed another person to perform the duties. He (Mr. R.) was in favor of the bill now introduced; for the wretched accommodation in the jail was sufficient to make a man a lunatic, whether he was previously so or not. He hoped the amendment would not be adopted.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD and VANDERPOEL,

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. HUBBARD, and it was rejected.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD then moved to lay it on the table, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Boyd, Burke, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Cross, Dana, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Griffin, Hand, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hubbard, Jameson, Jos. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kille, Lucas, McCulloch, McKay, Miller, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Paynter, Prentiss, Reynolds, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Thos. Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Turney, David D. Wagnor, Watterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Boardman, Bond, Brewster, Briggs, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chittenden, Cushing, Davee, John W. Davis, G. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dickerson, Dellet, Doe, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Garland, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Grinnell, John Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hillen, Hoffman, Hook, Jackson, James, Chas. Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Keim, Kempshall, Lane, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, Lowell, McCarty, F. Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Morrow, Naylor, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Peck, Pope, Randall, Kariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, E. Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Shepard, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Swearingen, Philip P. Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Warren, Weller, John White, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, and Worthington—107.

So the House refused to lay on the table.

After an amendment of the bill, by limiting its operation to lunatics who were paupers, it was read a third time; and the question being on its passage,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays.

Some debate of a desultory character then arose, in relation to the length of time the bill was to be in operation.

Mr. COST JOHNSON explained that the object of the bill was to make a temporary provision only, and that it was the intention of the Committee for the District, on a proper occasion, to introduce a bill for the erection of a building in this city for lunatics. Mr. J. then moved the previous question, which was seconded by the House. The main question on the passage of the bill was then ordered; and being taken by yeas and nays, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Boardman, Bond, Briggs, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Cushing, Davee, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Doe, Evans, Everett, Floyd, Galbraith, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Hill of Virginia, Hillen, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lane, Leet, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Naylor, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Pope, Randall, Reed, Ridgway, Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, John Smith, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Toland, Triplett, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Winthrop—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Chittenden, Clifford, Connor, Crabb, Crary, Cross, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Fillmore, Fine, Garland, Goggin, Griffin, Hand, Hawes, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of North Carolina, Hubbard, Joseph Johnson, Cave Jackson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kembie, Kille, Lucas, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Paynter, Peck, Prentiss, Reynolds, Jas. Rogers,

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to recommit it for the purpose of incorporating certain amendments, limiting the operation of the bill to two years, etc.

This motion was entertained; but without taking any question thereon, the House proceeded to the special order of the day, being the PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION CASE, between Messrs. NAYLOR and INGERSOLL.

Mr. INGERSOLL appeared at the bar of the House, and concluded his remarks from yesterday in support of his claim to the seat now occupied by Mr. NAYLOR.

The House then adjourned.

NOTE.—On the motion to reconsider the resolution of Mr. MEDILL on yesterday, Mr. JOHN HASTINGS voted in the negative, and not in the affirmative.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, January 7, 1841.

The PRESIDENT submitted a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of War, containing a list of the soldiers engaged in the last war with Great Britain, who are entitled to bounty land; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Postmaster General, with a list of the number and compensation of the clerks engaged in his Department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Crapin; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the House bill making provision for navy pensions, and in relation to half pay, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorials of citizens of Michigan, praying for the imposition of a duty on fish brought from Canada, asked that the committee might be discharged from their further consideration, and that the memorialists have leave to withdraw their papers. Mr. K. stated as a reason for this motion, that the Senate had no power by the Constitution to enact a bill imposing duties. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Luke Bonney, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. H. the petition of Theodore Brightwell was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred memorials for the extension of time to the deposit banks of Natchez for payment of money into the Treasury of the United States, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to extend further indulgence to certain of the late deposit banks; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred a bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under three several treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due to the United States, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Mary Snow, reported a bill for her relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Jacob Park and the heirs of Abraham White; which was agreed to.

Mr. TAPPAN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate, at as early a period as practicable, in a detailed and tabular form, all the information in the power of his Department in answer to the following questions:

1. What amount has the Federal Government lost, from its organization to this time, by the employment of banks, by the use of bank paper, or by its connections in any wise with banks, including the depreciation of bank paper.

2. What amount the people of the United States have lost, from the commencement of the Government to this time, by the failure and the suspension of banks, and by the depreciation of bank paper, by the loss and destruction of bank notes, and by the existence of banks and the use of bank paper generally.

3. What have the people and Government of the United States paid, directly and indirectly, to the aggregate banks of the United States, for the use of those institutions annually for the last ten years.

4. What proportion of the stock of the several banks of the United States is at this time owned by foreigners.

BILLS PASSED.

The joint resolution to present to universities and incorporate colleges, copies of the Catalogue of the Library of Congress.

The bill for the relief of Mary Prettyman; and

The bill for the benefit of the Howard Institute of the city of Washington; were severally read a third time and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez;

The bill for the relief of Gad Humphreys, of the Territory of Florida;

The bill for the relief of Molachi Hogan, of the Territory of Florida; were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Bulow, jr. deceased, being taken up—

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would ask of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, whether the committee were in favor of making compensation for all the losses of individuals occasioned by the war in Florida.

Mr. HUBBARD said that question had not been presented to the consideration of the committee. If it should be presented to that committee, so far as he was concerned, he was decidedly opposed to any such principle.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would to-morrow undertake to show that the bills which had just been ordered to a third reading, involved that principle, and, if it passed, would be the means of taking millions of money from the public Treasury.

Mr. HUBBARD would with pleasure listen to the Senator's views on the subject at his earliest convenience.

Some further conversation ensued as to the principles involved in these bills, in which Messrs. WRIGHT, HUBBARD, and KING, participated; when, by equal consent, the bill under consideration was informally passed over, with the understanding that it and the others for claims in Florida, would be discussed to-morrow.

The bill to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, approved 9th July, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved 2 March, 1833; and

The bill to authorize the issuing of a patent to the heirs or legal representatives of Francis Rivard, deceased; were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the substitute therefor submitted by Mr. PRENTISS.

After a slight modification of the substitute by Mr. PRENTISS,

Mr. HUNTINGTON addressed the Senate in favor of the substitute, and in opposition to various propositions of the bill, and was followed by Mr. HUBBARD, who submitted his views at length in favor of the principle of the bill, and in opposition to the amendment.

The debate was continued by Messrs. GRAHAM and PRESTON, whose remarks were principally confined to the relative powers of the General and State Governments on the subject of naturalization and citizenization.

Mr. ANDERSON rose with the purpose of submitting his views on the bill; but it being late in the afternoon, he yielded to a motion for adjournment;

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1841.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. LEET asked and obtained leave to withdraw the petition of the heirs of Capt. Richard Dollarear, late of the Revolutionary army, and the accompanying documents.

The SPEAKER then announced, as the special order, the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections relative to the

CONTESTED PENNSYLVANIA ELECTION CASE

between Messrs. NAYLOR and INGERSOLL.

Mr. FILLMORE, after alluding to the indisposition of Mr. NAYLOR, moved a postponement of the case until to-morrow.

Mr. MONROE objected, on the ground that to-morrow was the day for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had no objection to modify his motion so as to insert Monday.

After some debate of a conversational character, the motion was agreed to, and the further consideration of the subject postponed until Monday next.

LUNATICS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business was the motion of Mr. FILLMORE to reconsider the vote by which the bill making temporary provisions for lunatics in the District had been rejected.

After some brief remarks from Mr. TILLINGHAST,

Mr. MARVIN moved the previous question, which was seconded.

The main question on the reconsideration was then ordered to be put, whereon

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Boardman, Bond, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Cahan, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John W. Davis, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Doe, Doig, Edwards, Ely, Everett, Fillmore, Fisher, Galbraith, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hook, James, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lane, Leet, Lincoln, Lowell, Francis Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Morrow, Naylor, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Peck, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Stanley Stuart, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toand, Triplett, Trumbull, Warren, Weller, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Banks, Blackwell, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Crary, Cross, John Davis, Doane, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Garland, Griffin, Hand, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Keim, Kille, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Parrish, Paynter, Pickens, Prentiss, Reynolds, Ryall, Samuel, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeney, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Watterson, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—62.

So the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which was agreed to—ayes 95, noes not counted.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of going at that time into committee on the bill.

And the rules being suspended,

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and took up the bill.

Mr. FILLMORE offered an amendment limiting the operation of the act to March 3, 1843, which was agreed to.

The following amendment was also offered and agreed to:

"They being paupers of the said District of Columbia, their support being legally chargeable thereto."

A debate then followed, relative to the propriety of defraying the expense for the support of the lunatics out of the public treasury, in which Messrs. HAND, WADDY THOMPSON, WM. COST JOHNSON, FILLMORE, DAWSON, BRIGGS, and ALFORD, participated. The debate will be noticed hereafter.

On motion, the committee then rose and reported the bill, as amended, to the House.

The amendments were concurred in, and the bill read a third time; and the question being on its passage, was taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Boardman, Bond, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chittenden, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Thomas Davee, Edward Davies, John W. Davis, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Doe, Doig, Edwards, Ely, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Galbraith, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, John Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Holmes, Hook, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnson, Kemble, Kempshall, King, Lane, Leet, Lincoln, Lowell, Meredith Mallory, Francis Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Morrow, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Peck, Pope, Randall, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Stanley Stuart, Sumter, Sweeney, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Warren, Weller, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Banks, Black, Blackwell, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Crary, Cross, John Davis, Doane, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Garland, Griffin, Hand, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Keim, Kille, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, Medill, Montanya, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Parrish, Parris, Paynter, Prentiss, Reynolds, James Rogers, Ryall, Shaw, Shepard, Steenrod, Strong, Swearingen, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Turney, Watterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and John T. H. Worthington—60.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for its concurrence.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On the question being taken, there were—ayes 55, noes 73.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD also moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up a bill, reported last session, for satisfying the claims of soldiers who served during the last war, to bounty lands; but the motion was not seconded by the House.

The SPEAKER then called for NOTE.—From the low tone in which Mr. REED spoke on yesterday, his remarks were partially misconceived. Mr. R. said that the income or the emoluments of the office of marshal of this District was said to be ten thousand dollars, and that it was said the persons in jail were in the most wretched condition; and, said Mr. R. I believe it. The income or emoluments of office, said Mr. R. arise from fees, and the profit of boarding prisoners for about $2 50 per week.

Mr. R. felt bound, as an act of humanity, to make provision for the poor lunatics in this District. They assembled here from all parts of the country, and the District was not able to support them. He was, therefore, in favor of supporting these national lunatics from the national treasury.

OREGON TERRITORY.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked leave to introduce a joint resolution to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, and for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same.

Mr. LINN said that when this bill was up at the last session for discussion, both his political friends and opponents pressed him to forbear urging it during the negotiations with the British Government for the adjustment of another question, from a fear of embarrassing its settlement. This was not at the time convincing to him, but it was sufficient for him that it was the advice of gentlemen of experience, and he had acted in accordance with it. His opinion was that it would be better to put the whole of their claims on Great Britain together, and see what could be done with them; but he never expected that they would be amicably adjusted: The history of the British Government afforded him satisfactory evidence on this subject. He believed that every one there would be numbered with the dead before the British Government would amicably settle a question of this nature. If his memory served him correctly, England, pending the negotiations at Ghent, had been willing to purchase that territory; he did not mean to say there was any formal offer made, but, finding that no such arrangement could be entered into, she had, step by step, made progress in territorial encroachment, until she presented to the world a claim of great importance where she had not even the shadow of right; and such would be the case at every point of the contest with Great Britain. The British had extended their possessions, step by step, from the extreme branch of Columbia river to the Pacific ocean. By a letter which he had recently received, he learned that the Hudson Bay Company was introducing emigrants from Great Britain by Cape Horn; they brought shepherds and placed them on farms; they had erected British forts on the Territory of Oregon, and had pushed their establishments on the south to California, and on the east to the Rocky mountains; and by an act of Parliament, a portion of the criminal law of Great Britain was extended up to the very confines of the States of Arkansas and Missouri. Now, if we have a just right and claim to that property, he was not the man to say it should be abandoned to any power on earth. He was prepared and willing to go into a discussion of the whole subject here involved. He had been censured by many gentlemen from all parts of the Union for not having pressed this question before, when he delayed it because, on the suggestion of others, he was not willing to introduce a new element pending the question relative to the Northeastern boundary. He would not occupy the time of the body further on this occasion; but should the Senate grant or the introduction of the joint resolution, he would embrace the opportunity when it came up for consideration, to submit his views more in detail.

Leave being granted, the joint resolution was introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to a select committee of five, consisting of Messrs. LINN, WALKER, PRESTON, PIERCE, and SEVIER.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

On motion by Mr. STURGEON, the bill making certain appropriations for the Patent Office was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole,

The bill having been read,

Mr. CALHOUN hoped these appropriations would be stopped. This Patent Office was growing up into a new department of the Government—a Home Department. We had made an appropriation of $90,000 for the erection of a Patent Office, and there had been constructed a magnificent palace, with splendid galleries, at an expense of some hundreds of thousands of dollars. He was utterly opposed to this creating a new department in this Government, and more especially by indirection, as in the present instance, where those who were designed by law to be merely superintendents of the Patent Office were assuming a superintendence over the entire agriculture and mechanics of the country.

Mr. TAPPAN inquired whether the $750 proposed to be appropriated for a library was to purchase books for the officers in the Patent Office.

Mr. STURGEON said it was for the purchase of scientific books, which were necessary to enable the officers to carry on the business of the office.

Mr. TAPPAN objected to an appropriation for the purchase of books to enable the head of that department to qualify himself for the discharge of the duties of the office to which he had been appointed. It had now become too common with the heads of departments to have separate and valuable libraries, and it was time it should be stopped. He moved that the section in question be struck out of the bill.

Mr. PRENTISS explained the necessity of the appropriation; it was to enable the officer to learn whether what were offered as new and useful inventions were really new, as on the determination of that fact would rest the grant of a patent. Books were published periodically, containing descriptions of all new patented articles here and in Europe, and it was of the greatest importance that the officers should have these books as works of reference.

Mr. PRESTON also defended the appropriation; but suggested a variation of the phraseology of the section of the bill to obviate mistake. He was inclined to believe if the object was to purchase materials to enable the officer to form a correct judgment on the articles for which patents were desired, that it should be agreed to.

Mr. PRENTISS moved as an amendment the following words as a substitute for the words in the section: "for the purchase of such scientific books as are necessary for the Patent Office, $750."

Mr. TAPPAN thereupon withdrew his motion.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to strike out that part of the bill making an appropriation for the collection of agricultural statistics, &c. He knew not what that had to do with a Patent Office. He objected to this gradual and almost imperceptible growth of expenditures by indirect means; they had seen enough of these things; and he moved to strike out the appropriation of $1000 for that purpose, and he called for the ayes and noes on the question.

The ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. STURGEON said by striking out this section, they would strike out the vital part of the bill. The service which this sum was intended to remunerate, had already been rendered.

Mr. CALHOUN said no officer had the right to go beyond the appropriations, and he hoped the section would be struck out, as a warning to officers not to go beyond the appropriations in future.

Mr. MANGUM said the design of the Patent Office was for the preservation of the patents of the country, and he was unwilling that the power which had been exercised here should be allowed thus to creep upon them, and to cover other ground than that originally designed. He could not approve of a great show being thus prepared, by indirection, at the public expense.

At the request of Mr. STURGEON, a letter was read from the Commissioner of Patents, in which he urged the necessity for these appropriations.

Mr. SEVIER concurred in the suggestions of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that this should be put a stop to; but as they had got the articles, he thought they should be paid for and they could prevent its recurrence in future.

Mr. WEBSTER, to guard against misapprehension, explained that one item of expenditure was for the publication of a digest of the patents; and the books to which allusion was made, were periodicals on the subject of inventions which were necessary to the proper discharge of the duties of the Patent Office. The expenditures for agricultural statistics he would not continue, though he had no doubt of their constitutional right to do so. They had a constitutional right, he had no doubt, to expend money in procuring information on the subject of agriculture; the products of agriculture were articles that were interchanged between the various parts of the Union, and consequently it must be as important a part of their duty to inform themselves by agricultural statistics, as it was to acquaint themselves respecting cotton planting, sugar making, and all other articles of commerce in the country. But it did not seem to him that this had any relation to the Patent Office, and they had no right to make any appropriations for duties which were not prescribed by law.

Mr. CALHOUN differed from the Senator from Massachusetts in toto respecting their constitutional right to make these appropriations. And as to some of these appropriations, he considered they were an imposition and an insult on the Senate. They had been told that this Patent Office was to be a Patent Office, and that it would cost but $90,000, and under this consideration he had given a reluctant vote for it; and from that period, it had gone on in utter contempt of Congress until the expenditures had amounted to nearly half a million of dollars. Engineers and architects came there with estimates of public buildings, and then the actual expenditures exceeded the estimates one, two, three, and often four times. They were treated like children by these architects and engineers, and he thought it was the duty of the President of the United States to dismiss any officer who dared to do this.

After a few words from Messrs. STURGEON, KING, and WEBSTER,

Mr. RUGGLES explained that the original estimates were framed on plans for the construction of a brick edifice, but the other branch of Congress had amended the bill when it was before them, for the construction of a stone edifice, giving the Executive department authority to cause the construction of a building that should correspond with the other public offices.

Mr. STURGEON asked that the bill might be passed over, to afford an opportunity to procure information on some of the points objected to by Senators.

The bill was then informally passed over.

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, the petition and papers of Daniel Piatt, now on file, were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States and for other purposes, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the House of Representatives making temporary provision for lunatics in the District of Columbia, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill from the House authorizing the enrolment or register of the schooner Amistad, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, approved 9th July, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved 2d March, 1833; and

The bill to authorize the issuing of a patent to the heirs or legal representatives of Francis Rivard, deceased;

were severally read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez;

The bill for the relief of Gad Humphreys, of the Territory of Florida;

The bill for the relief of Malachi Hagan, of the Territory of Florida;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of John J. Bulow;

The bill for the relief of James Williams; and

The bill for the relief of Philip Weademan; were,

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, postponed to, and made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the substitute therefor submitted by Mr. PRENTISS.

Mr. ANDERSON submitted his views at length in opposition to the substitute, and in favor of the bill.

Mr. MANGUM said, as there were several Senators, himself among the number, who wished to submit their views in relation to this bill, he would ask its friends to postpone the further discussion of it until Monday next; which being agreed to, the bill was informally passed over.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he was in favor of a pre-emption law, but it must be on certain terms and conditions; and, to show what those terms and conditions were, he would submit the following proposition, which he would offer when the bill was again taken up, and which he asked might be ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the committee that reported it, with instructions to report amendments thereto, to the following effect:

1. To distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States of the Union in just and equitable proportions.
2. To grant to actual bona fide settlers upon the public lands the right of pre-emption to any quantity thereof, not exceeding one half section, or 320 acres, including the place of settlement, at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre; with such provisions as shall limit this right of settlement and pre-emption to actual bona fide settlers whose estate, at the time of settlement, shall not exceed the value of $1,000; and, furthermore, with such provisions as shall effectually exclude the wealthier speculators from all benefit under this law, and shall prevent them from interfering with, or participating in, the privilege and right of settlement and pre-emption, which are hereby granted and intended for the sole advantage of the needy and honest settlers and cultivators of the soil.

Mr. LINN then gave notice that he should move an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, for the purpose of appropriating the proceeds derived from the sale of the public lands, to increase the national defences. He hoped both his amendment and that of the Senator from Kentucky would be voted down; but he would move as often as this question came up, to apply the money to the protection of their frontier, both maritime and inland, from aggression in all future time.

Mr. BENTON said the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky was based on the one which there was no difficulty in comprehending. But the Senate and the country, from the first of the present session, had been told of the existence of a national debt which that Senator and his friends affirmed did exist, but which he (Mr. Benton) and his friends denied. The Senator had his thanks nevertheless, for coming forward with this proposition so openly: it was an intimation of the policy of the new Administration—of their intention to add to the national expenditures, to restrict the income of the country, and then to have recourse to a high tariff. He deemed this the opening up of the whole policy of the new Administration, and he was not willing to vote on it now, if they could decide against it by forty to one; he wished that policy to be laid open to the view of the people of the United States, and he only rose now to thank the gentleman for his declarations of yesterday and to-day—of yesterday, in favor of a National Bank, and to-day, on the subject of the land revenue, by which three or four millions would be diverted from the national income, and would have to be made up by loans and taxes. He (Mr. B) again thanked the Senator—they should now have a fair contest and no "bush whacking." They (Mr. Benton and his friends) would go to the contest with the opposite gentlemen, and they should see whether a national debt should be created, but which the Senators on the other side said did now exist, which he (Mr. Benton) denied, and they should see whether so large a sum should be withdrawn from the public revenue. He once more thanked the honorable Senator, and promised him that he would be met in the coming contest.

Mr. CRITTENDEN had intended nothing more on this occasion than to give gentlemen notice that such a motion would be made, and he had not supposed that it would now be debated. The honorable Senator from Missouri was perfectly welcome to all he could derive from it. He (Mr. Crittenden) had always looked upon himself as too humble an individual to have any great importance attached to any movement of his, and perhaps for that reason he had always been prompt and ready—perhaps too prompt, on some occasions—to express his opinions, whatever they might be. They were always such as he believed to be right, and therefore he was always ready to maintain them, in any contest. The proposition which he had just offered, was a plain proposition; he had no secret on this subject; what he was for he was for always, and was always ready to proclaim. He had received the thanks of the Senator from Missouri, but he feared he was reaping a reward far beyond his merits. The question of a distribution of the public lands among the States was no new question; it had once received the sanction of both branches of Congress, and the circumstances connected with the defeat of that bill were notorious; but the States continued to cling to that measure. The Legislature of his own

State had given him instructions on that question; and he had no doubt if his opinions on that subject were less firm, he should consider those instructions imperative. But he would not now debate the question; he would content himself with simply giving notice to gentlemen of his proposition, and the debate could follow when the proposition came up for consideration.

Mr. BENTON repeated the expression of his thanks, if the Senator from Kentucky would accept them, for the notice he had given them. Yet, for one, he (Mr. Benton) wanted no notice to be prepared to meet such a proposition. The gentlemen opposite had intimated their intention to detect and expose to the country, after the 4th of March next, a debt of twenty-seven and a half million of dollars, and they had been calling upon the supporters of the present Administration to tax French wine and silks—they had heard too often here these propositions for the purpose of making up a deficient revenue—it was a proposition to disturb the course of business and commerce, for the purpose of supplying a deficiency in the revenue which could not endure a moment's delay. It was to no purpose that the estimates were confined within the appropriations for the year; the gentlemen still said they must have taxes to create an income, and if they were not gratified, the present Administration was to take the odium—should he limit himself to the word odium?—to the odium of having rendered it necessary to call an extra session of Congress immediately. And while they were met with the threatened odium of an extra session of Congress to supply a deficient revenue, here came a proposition to take off three and half millions on which reliance was placed to carry on the Government. He again thanked the Senator for showing his hand so openly, and for the intimation that the new Administration was to commence at once the creation of a national debt, by subtracting from the revenue, with the re-establishment of that state of things by which the commerce of the country was loaded down by taxation; and that was to be followed up by the establishment of a Bank, to exercise an influence all over the country. He would tell that honorable Senator that a new National Bank could not be created without a National Debt, whose stock must be sold to make the capital for the Bank; he would tell the Senator from Kentucky he could not move an inch towards a new National Bank without the creation of a National Debt. He hoped, however, that his friends would put off measures of this kind to that called session of which they had been notified on that floor; for he informed gentlemen if they diverted the land revenue, and went beyond the current income, they would have to come together, which he (Mr. Benton) should do all he could to prevent, and he should do that by doing all he could to prevent the expenditures exceeding the estimates—by preventing the appropriations going beyond the current revenue. Let the new Administration call Congress together to make good the deficiency in the revenue occasioned by their own extravagant expenditures, and he (Mr. Benton) would thank them for the day on which they issued their proclamation.

Mr. CRITTENDEN would extend his claim to the gratitude of the Senator from Missouri, by the further avowal that he should be in favor of such an additional imposition of duties as will supply an adequate revenue to the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN said it was evident this debate would take a wide range, and would bring the whole subject of the public lands before the Senate; he rose to give notice that he would move, as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, a bill to cede the public lands within the limits of the new States on certain conditions therein mentioned.

[This bill will be found in another column, appended to the report made by Mr. NORVELL.]

The amendment proposed by Mr. CRITTENDEN was then ordered to be printed.

The Senate then went into Executive session, and, after half an hour spent therein, the doors were again opened.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing to be procured and submitted to the Senate, copies of the debates in the British Parliament, prior to the year 1820, in relation to the Northeastern boundary of the United States, and copies of land titles emanating from the British Government repugnant in the calls of said titles to the boundary now claimed by said Government.

Mr. PRESTON objected to the adoption of the resolution, as presenting us in the aspect of regulating our proceedings by British legislation.

Mr. CRITTENDEN would suggest whether it might not be possible that these debates made against our claim to the territory in dispute, and, if so, would it not, instead of strengthening, weaken the position we at present occupied in relation to the matter?

Mr. WALKER said, the resolution was one of inquiry only, the propriety of which would be decided on by the appropriate committee. If that committee, upon mature deliberation, conceived the inquiry to be important, it would be made; and in submitting this resolution, he desired only to call their attention to the subject. Mr. W. said, he had read one of these debates of the British Parliament, and conceived it to be of the utmost importance, and that it ought to be published in an official form for the information of the people of England, of the people of the British provinces, of the people of the United States, and of the civilized world. In that debate, the boundary line, as now claimed by Great Britain, was distinctly repudiated by both branches of the British Parliament, and by both parties, the Opposition and the Ministry, in a debate, too, contemporaneous with the treaty of 1783. Mr. W. also believed that land titles had emanated from the British Government, directly contradictory in the calls of those titles, to the boundary now claimed by England, and he thought the whole subject of sufficient importance to claim the attention of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WEBSTER said he agreed with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] as to the importance of these documents in shedding light on the true intent and meaning of the treaty of 1783, in relation to the boundary between the United States and the British Provinces. It clearly established, in his mind, that the treaty pursued the old boundary, as established by the charter of the colony of Massachusetts, and that the northwest corner of Nova Scotia was the starting point. There was also an important admission made by the then Lord Chancellor to the attacks of some of the Opposition members of Parliament. They denounced the treaty as granting a large territory to this country, the possession of which was necessary to the convenience and safety of their Canadian provinces. To this it was replied by the Lord Chancellor that there was nothing of grant on either side, but they had taken the boundaries as they had been previously established, and that no treaty could have been made upon any other terms. Throughout the whole of these debates, indeed, there is a broad admission by all parties of what this country has always claimed as the boundary between this country and the British Provinces.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that as this resolution was one of mere inquiry, it might appear discourteous towards his friend from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] to oppose its adoption, and he should do so with great reluctance. If it were pressed, he would, therefore, probably vote for it, although it appeared to him to be a singular duty to impose on the Committee of Foreign Relations. Unquestionably the debate in the British Parliament, to which it referred, was one of great importance. It proved that shortly after the original treaty was concluded, British statesmen of all parties agreed that the line designated by it included within the limits of the United States the territory now in dispute between the two Governments. But why should the Senate be made the instrument of communicating this debate to the public? Such a course was unprecedented, so far as his knowledge extended. This was information proper for the public, and it might be communicated, like all such information, through the agency of the public press. He thought this would be the best and most appropriate course; and unless his impressions should change, he would act upon this opinion, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, should the resolution be adopted.

He was glad of the present opportunity of saying a few words on another branch of the subject. It had been expected by some persons that the report of Messrs. Mudge and Featherstonhaugh would be noticed by the Committee on Foreign Relations. That report was a tissue of sophistry from first to last, which might be easily exposed; but so far as his information extended, it had never been officially recognized by the British Government. In this state of the case he did not believe it ought to be made the subject of any report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and therefore he had never called the attention of the committee to it. Besides, it was well understood that negotiations were now pending, and were nearly brought to a happy conclusion, for referring the final decision of this question to commissioners mutually chosen by the two Governments, with such an ultimate provision, in case of their disagreement, as must settle the question. Under these circumstances, he thought it would be improper for the Senate to interfere.

Mr. ALLEN said he was opposed to the adoption of this resolution. What was its object? To procure testimony in support of our claim to the territory embraced by the limits of Maine. He was opposed to this. So long as we debated, so long as we gave opportunity for cavil on this subject, so long would Great Britain protract its settlement. There is a point at which this matter must stop; where we must put our foot, and say, this admits of no further discussion. The British Government have just as much right to lay claim to the District of Columbia as any spot claimed by the United States. Suppose that Government should lay claim to this territory upon which we are now holding our deliberations, and we should undertake to argue the matter, and to hunt up documentary testimony to establish our claim, and we should pursue this course for a series of years, why, we should soon be as much at sea as we are at present in regard to the Northeastern boundary line. The great fault in this matter was in permitting it to be a subject of controversy. We should have placed ourselves on the line, as called for by the treaty of 1783, and we should have said to Great Britain, you cannot be serious or honest in attempting to make it a subject of discussion. Moot this question of title, and go in quest of evidence to support it, and you postpone its settlement indefinitely. So long as you keep the question open, Great Britain will use the argument that she is nearer to this territory than we are; at least her effective power, which she is constantly increasing, is nearer. Mr. A. said he considered this question as settled, so far as this body was concerned. It was settled by a unanimous vote of the Senate, who, though rent by the diversities of political feeling, excited by a contest which had raged through the course of twelve years, yet on this subject they had gone shoulder to shoulder, and, by a unanimous vote, had said this question, so far as we are concerned, is settled and determined; and there he was disposed to leave it. Mr. A. said there was troubles ahead. It was evident, from the conduct of her Minister on a recent occasion, that Great Britain, so far from a wish to have this affair promptly and amicably settled, was endeavoring to get up other questions of embroilment. He hoped the Senate would not again open this subject of the Northeastern boundary. We had already decided, by a unanimous vote, that our claim was right, and we will, if necessary, support it.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said the motion was to adopt a resolution to print certain debates of the British Parliament in relation to the boundary between the States and the British provinces. What was the present condition of the boundary question? It is the subject of negotiation. The diplomats are now acting on it and acting on it, as he was informed, in a spirit worthy of the enlightened Governments interested in the question, and the liberal and benevolent spirit of the age in which we live. Why then should we interfere? If the diplomats want these papers to enlighten them on the subject of their deliberations, they undoubtedly can have access to them in the libraries of this country or of Europe. He would say, without intending to cast reflections anywhere, that since 1815, the Executive action of the Government on this question had been much impaired by extraneous action. He referred to the report recently made by Messrs. Mudge and Featherstonhaugh as not having been adopted by the British Government; and said that it had been ably answered by a gentleman of this country, (Mr. Gallatin,) whose information on this subject was unsurpassed, if equalled, by any one on this continent. Mr. C. referred to the recent correspondence between the Secretary of State and the British Minister, in reference to McLeod, and said that the language used by Mr. Fox was such as should not have been used without instructions from his Government. He understood that the whole correspondence on the part of that Minister was without instructions, and he was not going to put himself in a passion on account of language used by a Minister under such circumstances. The affair of the Caroline was one of much delicacy; and it remains to be seen whether the order by the British authorities to capture the vessel was not intended to be limited to the waters over which they had jurisdiction, which might have been justifiable, but her capture and destruction at Fort Schlosser, on our own shore, was another and a very different matter. He wished this question to rest at present where the Constitution had placed it, in the hands of the Executive. Should it fail to be settled by negotiation, and was brought before us for our action, that course would be pursued which was dictated alike by the honor and interest of our country. And if collision should unfortunately ensue, he would not be hindmost in the defence of American rights, who, before that collision comes, is the most cool, and the most open to reason. He concluded by expressing his opinion that the idea of the probability of a rupture with Great Britain was entirely unfounded.

Mr. WALKER said, whatever opinions others might entertain in regard to this boundary controversy, there was one in which he had hoped that all would concur; and that was, that if war must come, we should have done all in our power to demonstrate, both to friends and foes, that the right of the case was with us, and not with Great Britain. Mr. W. said that before any conflict arose, he was in favor of demonstrating those rights; not by bold assertion or declamation; not by unmeaning menace, in advance, perhaps, of any real necessity; but by the publication of important documents, in an authentic form, containing the undeniable proof of the justice of all our claims, as conceded at one time by our opponents. This was a document that ought to be known to every citizen of the Union, and Mr. W. was especially desirous that it should be in the hands of all his constituents, that when (if ever) they should be called upon to expend their blood and treasure in maintaining the just claims of a sister State, they might know that those claims had been acknowledged by both parties and both houses of the British Parliament in 1783. Mr. W. said he was also desirous that this important debate might be published in an official form, in which it might reach the people of Canada; for he (Mr. W.) knew, from travelling through Upper and Lower Canada last summer, that the authenticity of this debate was denied there throughout both Provinces, and that much delusion prevailed, which might, in part, be dissipated by this publication. As, however, it was now late, Mr. W. would move for the present to lay the resolution on the table.

The resolution was accordingly laid on the table. And the Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, JANUARY 8, 1841.

Mr. EVERETT asked the general consent of the House, to introduce the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing, for the term of five years, the pensions allowed under the 'act granting half pay and pensions to certain widows,' passed July 7, 1833.

Objection being made,

Mr. EVERETT moved to suspend the rules, and thereon called for the yeas and nays.

After some conversation between Messrs. TALIAFERO, GALBRAITH, and EVERETT,

The yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted—yeas 99, nays 53—not two-thirds—as follows:

Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Warren, Watterson, and Lewis Williams—53.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. POPE gave notice that he would, on tomorrow, or on some subsequent day, ask leave to introduce a bill to extend the provisions of an act supplementary to an act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution, approved the 7th day of June, 1832.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred Senate bill, No 23, entitled "An act to authorize the inhabitants of township eight north, range thirty-two west, in the State of Arkansas, to enter a section of land, in lieu of the sixteenth section in said township, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States, for military purposes," made a report thereon, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report upon the petition of the widow of Herbert Lacroix, deceased; which report was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. CARR, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joseph McMillen.

Mr. C. MORRIS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Mary and Elizabeth Odell; which was laid upon the table.

Mr. M. also reported

A bill for the relief of John E. Wright;

A bill for the relief of Isaac Justice; and

A bill for the relief of Jacob Euler, accompanied by a report in each case; which bills were severally read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

STEAMBOAT DISASTERS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Select Committee on the subject, to whom had been referred the petition of John Coates and others, relating to steamboat disasters, and the means of their prevention; and likewise the report and bills submitted at the last session by the Select Committee to whom the petition of Samuel Raub, jr. relative to his self-acting safety valves, was referred, reported that they had adopted the report, and the bills submitted by the Select Committee during the last session, as follows:

A bill to provide for purchasing the patent for Raub's self-acting safety-valve;

A bill to authorize the President of the United States to employ persons to construct apparatus with a view to extinguish fires on board steamboats, and to test its utility.

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," approved July 7, 1838, and for other purposes.

The committee recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bills herewith presented shall be considered on the —, and made the special order on that and each succeeding day until disposed of.

After some debate of a desultory character the blank was filled by inserting "25th day of January instant;" and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

THE AMISTAD.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill entitled "An act to authorize the enrolment or register of the schooner Amistad." It was read twice; when

Mr. CURTIS explained that the Amistad was condemned, and afterwards sold by the Marshal, under an order of the District Court, for the salvage. But the individual who purchased the vessel, after becoming in possession of her, discovered that she, having been built abroad, could not be enrolled. An act of Congress, therefore, became necessary; and he (Mr. C.) hoped the bill would be passed forthwith, as she was now waiting to go out.

Mr. PICKENS objected to the passage of the bill at this time. A case in relation to the vessel in question was now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States; and he hoped the bill would not be put on its third reading until the decision of that Court should have been made.

Mr. CURTIS explained that the passage of the bill could in no way affect any proceedings of the Superior Court. The proceedings in the sale of the vessel had been all regular. The vessel was condemned and ordered to be sold under an order of the District Court, and was purchased by the present owner. He (Mr. C.) hoped that no objection would be made to the passage of the bill, as it was nothing more than an act of justice to the purchaser.

Mr. PICKENS still objecting,

Mr. CURTIS moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of putting the bill on its third reading; which motion was agreed to.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

PRIVATEER PENSION FUND.

Mr. SALTONSTALL submitted the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House what amount of money was received by the United States under the act of June 26, 1812, and the act of February 13, 1813, providing that two per cent. of the net amount of prize money arising from captures made by the private armed vessels of the United States be set apart as a pension fund, as set forth in said acts. Also, to report whether the same, or any and what part thereof, was invested; and if so, in what stocks or securities; and at what prices the said investments, and also the sales thereof, were made. And also to report when the said pension fund became exhausted, and how much of the same, or the proceeds arising therefrom, was paid to persons other than those for whose use the said fund was pledged by the said acts, and under and by virtue of subsequent acts.

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. CRABB submitted the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether it be legal for justices of the Supreme Court of the United States to reside out of the limits of the circuit court to which they are respectively assigned; and, if it be legal, to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by statute such residence.

On motion of Mr. WINTHROP, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the same provision for the payment of the arrears of their salaries to the clerks in the custom-house at Boston, which has been already made in behalf of the clerks in the custom-houses at New York and Philadelphia.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House the proceedings of the Naval Courts Martial for the trial of Commander Joseph Smoot, and Lieutenants Joseph Stallings and J. C. Sharpe.

Mr. KEMBLE proposed to add the following:

Also, all copies of the General orders in the cases of Lieutenants Sharpe and Stallings; exhibiting the reasons for confirming the decision of the court martial in the one case, and modifying it in the other.

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as modified was then adopted.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to this House the whole amount of public lands belonging to the United States, designating the amount in each State and Territory; the amount purchased in each year, and under each Administration; the amount of payment therefor; the amount surveyed, that has been offered at public sale and not sold; the amount sold in each year at public sale, and the amount sold at private sale; the amount of cash received in each year for lands; the amount of land given to each State and Territory, for all and every purpose; with the amount of cash paid each State out of the sales of public lands within her Territory.

Objection being made, it was laid over one day, under the rule.

Petitions were presented, on leave, by Messrs. GRINNELL, W. C. JOHNSON, PARMENTER, DOAN, SALTONSTALL, and STRONG.

[Mr. STRONG presented a petition of inhabitants of Seneca county, New York, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.]

On motion of Mr. STANLY, the bill entitled "A bill to pay the fourth instalment to the States," was ordered to be printed.

The bill for the relief of John J. Roane, a clerk in the Patent Office, was then taken up, the question being on its passage.

After a few remarks from Messrs. WISE and HOPKINS, as to the merits of the bill,

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Boardman, Calhoun, Carr, Chinn, Connor, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Garland, Francis Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Reynolds, Ridgway, Thomas Smith, Taliaferro, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Bond, Byrd, Breckenridge, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Wm. B. Campbell, Carroll, Casey, Chittenden, Clifford, Cole, Crabb, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Edward Davies, John Davis, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Doan, Doe, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gates, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Grasham, Granger, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hoffman, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, James, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Kemble, Kempshall, Kille, King, Leonard, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, Rogers, Russell, Ryall, Saltonstall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Steenrod, Sweney, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, Warren, Waterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Winthrop—140.

So the bill was rejected.

The bill for the relief of Mary Tucker was then taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TURNEY moved to adjourn.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded; and being ordered, were taken, and resulted as follows: Yeas 19—nays 116.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole (Mr. BRIGGS in the Chair,) and after some time spent therein, reported

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Adams and Company, and others; and

The bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard, and others; the former without amendment, and on the latter asking leave to sit again.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, January 9, 1841.

Mr. LINCOLN on leave, introduced the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish to this House a statement of the quantity of the public lands claimed to be purchased by pre-emption, under the several acts of Congress granting pre-emption to settlers on the public lands, distinguishing those under the act of Congress passed the 22d day of June, 1838, entitled "an act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," and also under "the act supplemental to the act" aforesaid, passed on the 1st day of June, 1840. And of the amount of money received into the Treasury, from the respective lands offices in the several land districts in which the public lands are situated. And that he also inform the House what number of patents to purchasers of the public lands, who have duly and legally made entries of the same, and paid the purchase money therefor, are suspended by reason of the operation of the aforementioned acts, and upon what cause, and for what time, such patents are to be withheld, and whether, in any event, the United States are made liable to refund to the persons who are permitted to make such entries, the purchase money paid therefor.

Mr. GIDDING asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That hereafter the daily hour of meeting of the House be 11 o'clock, a. m.

Objection being made the, resolution was not received.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill entitled "An act authorizing the issue of Treasury notes;" which was read twice, when,

Mr. STANLY called for the reading of the bill.

It was then read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued for such sum or sums, as the exigencies of the Government may require; but not exceeding the sum of five millions of dollars, of this emission outstanding at any one time—to be reimbursed in the last quarter of the year, if the condition of the Treasury will permit it—and to be issued under the limitations and other provisions contained in the act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October, 1837; and as modified by an act entitled "An act additional to the act on the subject of Treasury notes," approved the 31st day of March, 1840, except that this law shall expire in one year from and after its passage.

The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. O. BUTLER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the benefit of Littlejohn Wilkins, John Lynch, William P. Ford, and Alexander H. Patrick; which was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EDWARDS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Randolph Carter; which was read a first and second time, and committed.

Mr. STANLY, from the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, reported the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings have power to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That neither the President of the United States, nor any other officer of the General Government, shall issue certificates or due bills, or other evidences of debt or contract, without authority of law.

Mr. ADAMS called up for consideration the following resolution, offered by him on the 23d December last:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to this House the names of all the postmasters throughout the Union who have been removed from office since the 31 day of March 1829, with the names of the persons appointed in their places; underscoring the names of all those removed for official delinquency or misdemeanor, and specifying the nature thereof, the complaint upon which the removal was made, the evidence in support of such complaint, and whether the officer removed was made acquainted with the complaint, confronted with his accuser, or allowed to be heard in his defence.

Mr. HOPKINS submitted the following amendment:

1. Resolved, That the power of removing officers is vested in the President of the United States.

2. Resolved, That this power was conferred to enable him, the Executive, "to take care that the laws are faithfully executed," and cannot be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously, without an abuse of power, tyrannical in its operation, corrupting in its tendency, and converting a remedy for unworthiness and misconduct into a terrible engine of Executive power.

3. Resolved, That the patronage of the Executive department has increased to an alarming extent, and ought to be restricted and diminished so far as is compatible with a safe and faithful execution of the laws.

4. Resolved, That it is the right of the representatives of the people to examine into all abuses and usurpations which may be apprehended to exist in any of the Executive departments, in order that they may be corrected and prevented, if possible, by legislation; and in flagrant and wanton cases, exposed and punished.

5. Resolved, That the power of appointment and of removal from office, vested in the Executive, may be greatly abused; and its exercise ought, therefore, to be watched and strictly guarded, so as, if possible, "to prevent the power and patronage of the Executive from being brought into conflict with the freedom of elections."

6. Resolved, That the representatives of the people have a right to inquire into the causes for which any Executive officer has been removed or dismissed from office by the Executive.

7. Resolved, That, in prosecuting such inquiry, the House of Representatives has a right to call for, and have furnished to it, all official documents, papers, and letters, relating to the removal of such officer, which may be on file among the records of any of the Executive Departments.

8. Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire and report a bill imposing such restrictions upon Executive patronage as may be consistent with the foregoing resolutions, and compatible with the Constitution of the United States, and so as more effectually to guard against abuse and corruption in the exercise of the power of removal from, and appointment to, office.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, after some brief remarks in relation to the short time now remaining of the present session, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. ADAMS contended that the amendment was incongruous with the original proposition. He wished to know if the gentleman from Virginia intended, by his amendment, to crush the resolution. He (Mr. A.) did not believe the amendment was in order.

Mr. HOPKINS disavowed any intention to crush the resolution by his amendment. The amendment was intended to act prospectively, and to prevent the occurrence of such alleged abuses in future.

After some further remarks from Mr. ADAMS, in which he made his objection a point of order, and which took precedence of the motion to lay on the table,

The SPEAKER decided that the amendment was in order.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from that decision.

Mr. BANKS, believing that no good was likely to arise from discussion, whether the amendment was in order or not, moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. ADAMS, on this motion, demanded the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were taken, and resulted as follows: yeas 95, nays 80.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

The question then recurring on the motion to lay the whole subject on the table, the yeas and nays were ordered, and taken as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Aherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Clifford, Coles, Connor, William R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornace, Galbraith, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of N. C. Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Swearingen, Sweney, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weiler, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Bernard, Boardman, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Cranston, Crockett, Cartis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Doe, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fisher, Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hall, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Va. Hoffman, Holmes, Hopkins, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lane, Lincoln, Francis Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Morrow, Nisbet, Palen, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Shepard, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Sumter, Tallaferro, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Underwood, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—92.

So the House refused to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. HOPKINS, the latter said he would have no objection to vote for the resolution, provided the gentleman from Massachusetts would incorporate the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS declined, on the ground of the amendment being of an entirely different nature to the resolution; the latter complaining of no abuses, but merely calling for facts, while the former involved a set of principles in relation to the exercise of Executive power, etc.

The morning hour having now expired, the amendment was ordered to be printed, when the House proceeded to the orders of the day, being the consideration of private bills.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States inform this House what six land districts have been discontinued under the act of June 12, 1840, and when they were respectively discontinued; also, what salaries or other emoluments were paid the officers of such districts between the 12th of June aforesaid and the discontinuance of such districts—specifying the sums paid to each individual. And that the Secretary also report the amount of revenue that was paid to each receiver of such districts between the time of their discontinuance and the said 12th day of June, 1840.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The bill for the relief of Mary Tucker, of Arkansas, which was on yesterday ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Adams and Company, and others, reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole, was next taken up; and after some debate, in which Messrs. SALTONSTALL, DAWSON, WINTHROP, HOLMES, C. JOHNSON, W. THOMPSON, HABERSHAM, and EVANS participated,

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. C. JOHNSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard and others, owners of the ship Ariadne and her cargo.

After some debate thereon, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

And then the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, January 11, 1841.

The transaction of the morning business occupied the Senate until near the hour of 1, p. m.

Various petitions and memorials were presented by Messrs. TALLMADGE, BUCHANAN, WEBSTER, WALL, WHITE, PORTER, SEVIER, and STURGEON.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the credentials of Mr. NICHOLSON, the newly appointed Senator from Tennessee, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the decease of the late FELIX GRUNDY. Mr. NICHOLSON appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Sundry bills were then introduced and read the first time. By Mr. WALL, for the relief of Lieut. John E. Bishop. After a short explanation by Mr. WALL, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

On leave, two several bills were introduced by Mr. SEVIER, and laid upon the table.

Mr. CLAY presented the certificate of the authorities of the State of Kentucky of the re-election of JOHN J. CRITTENDEN to a seat in the Senate; which was read, and placed on file.

Mr. GRAHAM asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to abolish the port of delivery in the office of the surveyor of the customs at Currituck, North Carolina.

Mr. LINN submitted a resolution, which was adopted, giving certain instructions to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Several reports of little magnitude, adverse to the allowance of certain private claims, were taken up, and agreed to.

The bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

The unfinished business of Friday, the PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

This bill being again in order, THE PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said, when he offered his motion, he did not intend to delay the bill, and he would now leave gentlemen to dispose of it as they thought proper.

Mr. BENTON looked upon the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, if adopted, as going to destroy the bill—not directly, but by loading it down with incongruous matter. There was a latitude usually allowed to Senators in their amendments of measures brought before them, and when it was desired to destroy the whole bill, it was customary to move to strike out all but the enacting clause, and to substitute other matter instead; but to include in a bill incongruous matter that was entirely foreign to its object, whatever might be the object of the mover, was directly to defeat the measure. He knew it was also a fair and parliamentary practice, where Senators approved of part of a bill, and disapproved of other parts, to move to strike out the objectionable matter; but what was the proposition then made? There was a bill to grant pre-emptions, which they had done for forty years under this Government—a question which was not only free from constitutional difficulties, but one, the benefits of which had been tested by experience—and for the first time, a gentleman who was hostile to the bill, offers a proposition to amend, not by striking out all after the enacting clause, for that would be parliamentary, but to amend by adding to it a scheme for the distribution of the public land revenue! Could any thing be more incongruous than this? The distribution of the land revenue brought up a question of the gravest kind—it involved a constitutional question of great importance—it would originate the inquiry whether the land revenue was not as much the revenue of the Government, when it came into the Treasury, as every dollar paid by the merchant on the importation of his goods; and then came up the consideration of the distribution of the revenue of the country at all; and that, if they had the right, whether it would be expedient to do it at any time, especially at the present time. Then would follow the whole question of their financial system, the income and the expenditures of the Government, and the inquiry whether it was possible for the Government to get along with the current payments without the land revenue; and then, if the Government could not get along without the land revenue, how was the deficiency to be supplied—whether by loans or taxes? Here, then, were questions of the greatest moment; some of them believed to be unconstitutional, and others mischievous, and all involving a vast mass of expenditure, which would bear heavily on the country. Now he repeated that it was contrary to all legislation—contrary to all customary rule of proceeding, thus to bring in a foreign and overpowering and overshadowing subject at such a time to sink and destroy an ordinary measure of legislation, as it passed along. He held that this ought not to be the mode in which an enemy of the bill should attack it; the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] was the enemy of the pre-emption bill; and let him then attack it fairly—let him attack it in the front—let him give his reasons against it; but let him not, by this side movement, bury it under incongruous matter—let him not destroy it by a side blow, as the measure was passing along. Such a proposition as that by the Senator from Kentucky does not belong to the legislation of the Senate—it does not belong to the legislation of any body, and he (Mr. BENTON) denounced it as contrary to all fair legislation, wherever legislation was known.

This distribution policy commenced some years ago, and he then denounced it; he told them that if they commenced a division of the surplus, it would be but a little time before they divided that which was not the surplus. In one of his speeches, to which he had not thought it necessary to refer, he had told them that if the States once began to lick that blood, they would live on no other food from that time forth—if they began to look to the Federal Government for money, they would come in and take from that Government the means of its own support; and now had they not proved the truth of his prediction? He had told them then that to distribute among the States what was called the surplus, which was then placed in the banks, would be either to make the deposit banks close their vaults, or to ruin their debtors; and he had told them, also, that it must be done to the exhaustion of the Treasury; but nothing would do, for the books called it "surplus." He told them if they took that first step, it would be the first plunge downward, from which there was neither retreat nor halt; and had they not now a proposition, in four short years from the time of his prediction, to abstract from the current income of the Government a sum of four millions of dollars per annum, at a moment when the Secretary of the Treasury showed them, in his report, that it was as much as could be done to make the annual outgoings and incomings balance each other—at a time, too, when gentlemen on the other side proclaimed a debt of twenty-seven millions of dollars which they intended to detect at their called session? What, then, were to be their feelings? Were they to look on and see the Federal Government stripped of every shilling of its revenues? Were they to see the States, when they found themselves in want of money, seize the means of the Federal Government, and tell it to take care of itself? Had it come to this? He denounced it as one of the most outrageous propositions that was ever made under our form of Government. Here was a proposition to withdraw one fourth part of the revenue in a time of difficulty, and at a period when one party was proclaiming a hidden, a secret debt of twenty-seven millions, and the gentleman who made the enormous proposition did not tell them what substitute he had to propose. Why did not the gentleman go on with his instructions, and direct the Finance Committee to borrow four million of dollars, or to issue four millions of Treasury notes, or to impose four millions of taxes to supply the place of the abstracted land revenue? And let him observe, they could not deceive others if they deceived themselves. If they deceived themselves they could not deceive others when they said: "We cannot constitutionally borrow money or raise money by taxes, to divide among the States; but one thing we can do, we can take the money we find in the Treasury, give it to the States, and impose a tax, or borrow, or strike Treasury notes to supply the place of that which we give away." And yet this was the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky: qualify it as he pleased, defend it or shrink from its defence, as he pleased, it came to this: "here is a marked proposition to raise revenue by loan or tax for distribution among the States." In the mind of every candid man it was the same as a proposition to lay a tax for distribution among the States in the first instance.

The gentleman from Kentucky, in his amendment, proposed 320 acres of land to the pre-emptors, as part of the distribution bill. But he (Mr. BENTON) was not to be caught by tides. Now here was a proposition to give 320 acres of land! Would the Senator from Kentucky vote for 160? No: he would contend that it was too much; but if he would not give 160 acres, he would give 320. Was it to be supposed that this kindness overmuch would impose upon any body? The friends of the bill did not ask 320 acres, because they would have expected double the opposition from the other side of the House; and yet here was a proposition to add to the bill as much as to double what its friends proposed to give. And from whom did it come? From the enemies of the bill. And for what purpose? Why, to destroy the bill. And what then? Why, to show to the settlers that they voted for 320 acres, and that his (Mr. BENTON's) side of the House voted against the proposition. He had seen such legislation as this before, and he had laid it open to the public; and he had not seen a man occupying a real "log cabin" that could be found to be taken in by it. No, it took the inhabitants of the city "log cabins"—the silk stockings and kid glove gentlemen—to be deceived by it. This proposition would deceive no one that dwelt in a real log cabin; and he was not surprised that the gentleman hesitated to defend his proposition. It was an enormous proposition—it was an unparliamentary one—it was a hostile, deadly hostile one; and he

(Mr. BENTON) had denounced it as such the moment it came in, and he should continue to do so; and he should meet his constituents and tell them he voted against the 320 acre proposition, as part of the distribution bill, knowing the intention of its mover was to destroy the 160 acre proposition, which was then pending.

Mr. MANGUM spoke at length in opposition to the pre-emption policy.

Mr. LINN defended the bill. He said that this Government had been settled on the pre-emptive system from the beginning; and he wished to keep the beginning, the middle, and the end together. In allusion to the epithets applied by some gentlemen to the settlers, of "land stealers" and "squatters," and of the opinions of others in contradiction of his statement, that a small civil force, and an enforcement of the laws, would preserve the public land from encroachment, he said that it was a scriptural injunction to man to possess the earth, and replenish it; but if it were "land stealing," this was a nation of land stealers from the beginning, for they had either stolen it or cheated the Indians out of it; and therefore the appellation would apply equally to their forefathers. That the movement of the people would be onward, he again asserted; and he denied that the laws were a sufficient safeguard of the public lands. Jurors could not be found to convict in such cases, which were uniformly decided against the Government, at an expense of many thousand dollars. Would they, then, send an army to destroy the "squatter"? If he had an enemy in the world, (and he believed he had not many,) he would wish him no greater infliction than the scorpion stings of conscience, with which the execution of such a commission would be succeeded. It was not unusual by legislation, to heal breaches in the law. Charters were sometimes violated, and legislation was resorted to to heal the breach. Here, then, was a breach of the law by the settlers, and they were asked to pass this bill, to heal that breach.

Mr. CALHOUN wished to move an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. He hoped now the debate would take the widest range, and embrace all the subjects in connection with the great land question. He desired to state his views thereon, and he should occupy the Senate perhaps an hour.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama interposed, and requested the Senator from South Carolina to put his amendment into shape, so that it could be printed, and to give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CALHOUN assented, and his amendment was ordered to be printed. Its object was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to substitute his "bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, on certain conditions."

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, January 11, 1841.

After the journal had been read,

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections relative to the PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION CASE, between Messrs. INGERSOLL and NAYLOR.

Mr. NAYLOR being entitled to the floor, proceeded to reply to the remarks of Mr. INGERSOLL. After speaking for two hours and a half, he gave way to

Mr. SERGEANT, who moved that the House do adjourn.

At the request of Mr. J. W. JONES, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. JONES, by general consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill entitled An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1841; which was read twice, referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

A message was received from the President of the United States,

When the special order, the PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW, was again under consideration.

Mr. CALHOUN having the floor, proceeded, in that usually lucid, clear, forcible, and statesmanlike manner with which he meets all questions of such grave public import, to present his views upon the subject under discussion. He took a rapid glance at the present condition of the country, its past legislation upon the subject of the public lands, the little hitherto effected by that legislation, and the necessity that now demanded of Congress the speedy, the final, and the proper and appropriate settlement of this great national subject, so as to meet the interests and the wants of the country. He met the unsound and fallacious objections of the opponents of the bill, by pointing to the present actual situation and condition of the land revenue of the Union, and gave a condensed statistical reference to the prominent facts which the public records so fully exhibited, and which should be correctly understood by that body, and by the people, that a barrier might be erected to prevent the danger which threatened the nation.

Mr. CRITTENDEN replied to Mr. CALHOUN, and occupied the Senate for about two hours. He referred to the extraordinary course pursued towards him by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] and by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] the former having considered his proposition as most extraordinary and enormous; and the other as idle, ridiculous, and foolish.

Mr. C. took a general view of the whole subject of the pre-emption bill, and defended with much ingenuity and skill his proposed substitute and amendment.

Mr. BENTON again adverted to the arguments adduced by the enemies of the measure under discussion, and particularly to the attempted defence of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] His arguments were all enforced with his known ability, and his usual bold and commanding eloquence.

Mr. CRITTENDEN rejoined, and

Mr. BENTON again replied, and the debate was continued between them until the hour of adjournment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, January 12, 1841.

The first business in order was the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections relative to the

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION CASE

between Messrs. NAYLOR and INGERSOLL.

Mr. NAYLOR being entitled to the floor, was about to resume his remarks, when

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, presented the petition of two stone cutters, lately employed on the public buildings, complaining of their exclusion from work thereon, and protesting "against a system of favoritism which at present operates so much to their detriment;" which petition was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. GREEN asked leave to submit a resolution directing the Committee on Ways and Means to consider the expediency of reporting a bill imposing a tariff on wines, spirits, and other luxuries, for the purpose of meeting demands upon the Government.

Objection being made, the resolution was not received.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked leave to offer the following:

Resolved, That the SPEAKER of this House be requested to issue a subpoena duces tecum to Samuel Hart, esq. prothonotary of the court of common pleas for the city and county of Philadelphia, directing the said Samuel Hart, esq. to appear personally, or by deputy, before this House, at one o'clock, p. m. on Friday, the 15th instant, with the election returns and other papers on file in his office, relating to the Congressional election in the Third Congressional district in the State of Pennsylvania in 1838, there to be examined in evidence in the case of contested election now pending between C. J. INGERSOLL and CHARLES NAYLOR, from the said Congressional district.

Objection being made, it was not received.

Mr. NAYLOR here observed, that if it should be the pleasure of the House, he would have no objection to waive a continuation of his remarks until the expiration of the morning hour.

And such being the understanding,

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Judiciary Committee, to which had been referred the Senate bill amendatory of the act abolishing imprisonment for debt in certain cases, reported the same without amendment, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the act entitled "An act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases," approved February 28, 1839, shall be so construed as to abolish imprisonment for debt on process issuing out of any court of the United States, in all cases whatever where, by the laws of any State, imprisonment for debt has been, or shall hereafter be, abolished.

Mr. S. after some explanatory remarks, showing the necessity of the amendment to the original act, whereby its application would extend to non-residents of the State of New York, hoped the bill would be passed forthwith.

Mr. ADAMS urged some constitutional objections to the bill in its present form. He did not know what laws the States might hereafter adopt, by which, whatever they might be, Congress would be bound to abide. He therefore moved to amend, by striking out the words, "or shall be hereafter."

After some brief remarks from Messrs. MONROE, THOMPSON, and FILLMORE,

Mr. HUBBARD said, when it should be in order, he would offer a further amendment, so as to compel every man to make a surrender of his property before his release.

The question being on the amendment of Mr.

ADAMS, the discussion was further continued by Messrs. BARNARD, FILLMORE, VANDERPOEL, and POPE, involving split-hair distinctions in matters of law; when

Mr. HABERSHAM moved to recommit the bill with the following instructions:

"To report a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt under process issuing from the courts of the United States in all cases except where the judgment shall be against an officer of the United States for a defalcation in his office."

After some further explanation from Mr. SERGEANT in relation to the peculiar powers of the judiciary of the United States,

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved the previous question, which was seconded by the House, thereby cutting off the motion to recommit, and bring the House to a direct vote on the amendment of Mr. ADAMS.

The main question on the amendment was then ordered, and taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Boardman, Calhoun, Casey, Garret Davis, Dromgoole, Everett, Fillmore, Galbraith, Gates, Habersham, Hopkins, Charles Johnston, Kemble, McKay, Marvin, Osborne, Parmenter, Peck, Randall, Reed, Saltonstall, Truman Smith, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Thomas W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Barnard, Beatty, Bond, Boyd, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clifford, Connor, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Curtis, Dana, Edward Davies, John W. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dickerson, Dellet, Doan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Evans, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Granger, Green, Griffin, Hall, Hand, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hoffman, Hook, Hunt, James, Jameson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Kempshall, Kille, King, Lane, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McCulloch, F. Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Medill, Monroe, Montanya, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, S. W. Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Paley, Parris, Pope, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—110.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back to the House, without amendment, the following Senate bills, viz:

An act to prevent the counterfeiting of any foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States, or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin;

An act to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected by her for that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal, which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes; and which bills were severally read, and referred to a Committee of the whole on the state of the Union.

An act to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes;"

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the consideration of the following Senate bills, viz:

An act in addition to an act for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay;

An act for the relief of John Moore; and

An act for the relief of Clements, Bryan, and Company; which bills were transferred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, from the further consideration of an act for the relief of John Carter, which was transferred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

Judiciary, reported "An act further to amend the act entitled an act to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," approved March 3, 1839, with an amendment. The amendment was concurred in, and the bill read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMPBELL then renewed his attempt to introduce his resolution, previously noticed; but objection being made,

Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules; the motion was negatived.

Mr. NAYLOR then took the floor, and resumed his remarks in reply to Mr. INGERSOLL. After speaking for some time, without concluding, he gave way for a motion to adjourn.

And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1841.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that it had passed the bill from the Senate supplementary to an act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases.

The PRESIDENT submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury of the names and compensation of the clerks in his Department; and

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON on the 16th December last:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to cause to be prepared and communicated to the Senate, tables of the rates of exchange, foreign and domestic, and of the prices of bank notes and of specie, on or near the first day in each month, at New York and Philadelphia, during the year 1838, 1839, and 1840; and that he accompany the same with a synopsis of the rates of exchange, foreign and domestic, and the prices of bank notes and specie, at New York and Philadelphia, in previous years, so far as the last can be done from the materials now in the Treasury Department.

The communications were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented the credentials of the Hon. JOHN LEEDS KERR, elected by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, a Senator from that State, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. JOHN S. SPENCER.

Mr. KERR appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. BENTON called the attention of Senators to a report which was to be found in volume eight of the Executive documents of last session, which was calculated to throw considerable light on the subject now under discussion by the Senate. He alluded to a report by the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount of land purchased by this Government from the Indians, and the money paid therefor. It appeared from this document that the amount of land to which the Indian title has been extinguished, is four hundred and forty-two millions of acres, and the amount paid therefor eighty-two millions of dollars.

On motion by Mr. LINN, the memorial of the corporate authorities of the city of St. Louis, praying a reimbursement of moneys expended on their harbor, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. ROBINSON, the petition and papers of Neil Moore and Company, now on file, were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Howland Dyer, was discharged from its further consideration; and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petitions of John Vance, and the petition of E. Shaler, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, to which were referred petitions on the subject, reported

A bill for the relief of John McClanahan;

A bill for the relief of Margaret Jamison; and

A bill for the relief of Mary Neal, widow of Samuel Neal; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. P. also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of the heirs of Daniel Pettibone; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill to authorize the erection of monuments to Brigadier General Nash and Brigadier General William Davidson, reported the same without amendment.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TAPPAN, in relation to the rules, was taken up, and discussed by Messrs. HUBBARD, PIERCE, LINN, TAPPAN, and HUNTINGTON, and, on motion of the latter, was laid on the table.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for the relief of John C. Reynolds;

The bill for the relief of Francis Laventure, Ebenezer Childs, and Linus Thompson;

The bill for the relief of James H. Relfe;

The joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to extend further indulgence to certain of the late deposit banks; were severally read a third time, and passed.

Mr. PHELPS submitted a resolution directing the Secretary of the Senate to pay, out of the contingent fund, to the widow of the late Stephen Haight, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, the sum of five hundred dollars for the purpose of defraying the expenses incidental to his illness, and the removal of the body to Vermont for interment; and, also, to pay the widow the amount of salary accruing for the residue of the term for which he was elected.

The resolution, after some remarks in explanation by Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. PHELPS, was adopted.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN to the motion to recommit the bill made by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. PRESTON submitted his views at much length in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SEVIER said he wished to submit a few remarks to the Senate on the question now before them, and though he would not occupy much of their time, he would endeavor to hold a lookingglass to some of the gentlemen who had been so loudly boasting of their friendship and generosity to the new States.

At the instance of several Senators, Mr. S. here gave way for a motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1841.

The first business in order was the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections relative to the PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION CASE, between Messrs. NAYLOR and INGERSOLL.

Mr. NAYLOR being entitled to the floor, was about to resume his remarks, when

Mr. GREEN asked him to give way for a few moments to enable him to again submit the resolution which he offered on yesterday, and to which objection had been made, directing the Committee of Ways and Means to consider the expediency of reporting a bill imposing a tariff on wines, milks, and other luxuries, for the purpose of meeting demands upon the Government.

Mr. NAYLOR said he gave way to half a dozen applications yesterday, but could not pursue a similar course to-day, as he had a desire to get through the matter now before the House.

Mr. N. then resumed his remarks, and spoke for some hours in reply to the arguments of Mr. INGERSOLL. Without concluding, at three o'clock, Mr. N. gave way to a motion to adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was, however, withdrawn, to permit the following Senate bills to be taken up; which were severally read a first and second time, and appropriately referred:

An act to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, approved 9th July, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved 2d March, 1833;

An act to authorize the issuing of a patent to the heirs or legal representatives of Francis Revard, deceased;

An act for the relief of Mary Prettyman;

An act for the benefit of the Howard Institution of the city of Washington;

An act to refund to Noah Miller and others a part of the proceeds of the sale of the British sloop Mary and cargo, which were captured by them and labelled and sold for the benefit of the United States;

An act for the relief of Thomas Haskins and Ralph Haskins;

A resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to extend further indulgence to certain of the late deposit banks;

An act for the relief of Francis Laventure, Ebenezer Childs, and Linus Thompson;

An act confirming to George Tucker, his heirs or assigns, a certain tract of land in Alabama;

An act for the relief of Thomas P. Copes;

An act for the relief of Joseph Bogy;

An act for the relief of Charles M. Keller and Henry Stone;

An act to perfect the title to lands south of the Arkansas river, held under New Madrid locations, and pre-emption rights under the act of 1814;

An act to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee, to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those States;

An act for the relief of Jubal B. Hancock;

An act in addition to an act to promote the progress of the useful arts;

An act for the relief of Daniel Steenrod; and

An act for the relief of James M. Morgan.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications, viz:

1. From the Post Office Department, in compliance with the second section of the act of July 2, 1836, to reorganize the Post Office Department, enclosing estimates for the service of that Department for the year commencing July 1, 1841.

Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

2. From the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in obedience to the act of the last session of Congress, requiring him "to make to Congress annually, at the commencement of the year, a report of the manner in which all appropriations for the public buildings and grounds have been applied."

Referred to the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings.

Mr. BRIGGS asked that his colleague, Mr. W. S. HASTINGS, be excused from serving on the Committee on Private Land Claims, in consequence of ill health; which request was agreed to.

Mr. CRABB presented the petition of a large number of the citizens of Pickens county, Alabama, for the establishment of a mail route from the town of Bridgeville, via the town of Fairfield in said county, to the town of Macon, in the county of Noxubee, Mississippi; referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

IMPORTED MANUFACTURED SILK.

Mr. ADAMS, after some introductory remarks on the importance of early action on the House bill, No. 311, for laying a duty on imported manufactured silks, hoped it would be made the special order for that day fortnight.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he would be very glad to give his assent to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, especially as it was a measure that proposed to bring money into the public Treasury; but the process would be entirely too slow to answer any practical purposes at the present session. Besides, as he (Mr. J.) had already introduced a bill providing for a more speedy operation, (the Treasury Note bill,) he hoped the bill referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts would not be taken up until the other measure had been before the House.

Mr. J. observed that several subjects had already been made the special order for certain days; and if the bill now referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts should also be made the special order, and took up much time, as it undoubtedly would, he (Mr. J.) did not know when an opportunity would be afforded for considering the Treasury note bill, the pension bill, and other important measures requiring early action. He hoped, therefore, that gentleman would not press his request.

Mr. ADAMS observed that the bill he held in his hand was intended to devise means for repaying the proposed loan of Treasury notes; and as at this very time very large importations were making in the port of New York, he thought it highly necessary that the bill should be entered upon without delay.

Mr. JONES again adverted to the delay which must necessarily arise from the consideration of such a bill, and he was sure, if the gentleman from Massachusetts would reflect upon the condition of the Treasury, at the present moment, he would see the necessity of postponing the bill. It was highly important that a temporary supply should be made so as to enable the Treasury to meet the demands upon it during the present quarter; not but that the accruing revenue would enable the department to meet the demands against it during the year, but it would not enable it to meet them in time.

Mr. J. referred to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in order to show the inequality of receipts and expenditures during the present year, which would make it necessary that a temporary provision should be made to enable the Treasury to meet demands upon it which would be made before the funds appropriated to meet them should have been received. The report stated that unusually heavy expenses would fall due during the first quarter of the present year. "In addition to a full portion of the current expenses, and the whole pension payments for the first half of the year, and one-third of a million or more for all the annual fishing bounties, there will be imposed on it most of the charges for the whole year, connected with the session of Congress and private bills, as well as large payments for taking the census, and for the first instalment of the debt of this District, etc."

Mr. J. also referred to the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, laid on their tables this morning, as a further reason why no delay should take place in reference to the Treasury Note bill.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 21, 1840.

SIR: I perceive that a new appropriation bill has passed at this session for sums exceeding $400,000, considerable portions of which will probably be called for from the Treasury during the present year.

Another appropriation bill appears to have been reported, with a view to its immediate passage, which is supposed to be nearly double the amount of the other, and an addition proposed to it, on account of navy pensions, of a sum between $150,000 and $200,000, entirely new in its character. Much of this addition, if made, is likely to be drawn for the present month, as it may be needed on or before the 1st day of January, and probably some portions of the original bill as reported. These new charges on the present year are of such magnitude as (with the circumstances hereafter specified, and others referred to in the second, tenth, and eleventh pages of my recent annual report) to render it proper, in the opinion of the undersigned, that he should repeat the recommendation contained in that report—that they be accompanied by some early provision of additional means to meet the whole of them with promptitude.

The letters annexed, just received, show likewise some recent decisions of the courts, that appear to require the refunding of more duties from the Treasury, to a considerable amount.

Another communication is also annexed, which reached the Department to-day, and shows the extraordinary drawbacks about to be demanded in a single case, on refined sugars, extending probably to $75,000 or $80,000; a sum nearly equal to half of the nett revenue often collected in a week in the whole Union.

To meet calls like these, in addition to those first specified by the new appropriations, will probably much reduce the balance heretofore anticipated at the close of the year.

Under these circumstances, coupled with those referred to in my annual report rendering some provision proper, not only to cover ordinary contingencies and fluctuations, but especially to provide adequate means for meeting seasonably the large charges then explained to be imposed on the first quarter of the year 1841, and several of them as soon as the 1st of January, the hope is entertained that some such temporary provision will be made at the earliest day practicable.

Looking to the security and high standing of our national credit, it was deemed prudent, when that report was prepared, that it be done by the commencement of the year; and the occurrences since tend strongly to confirm the opinion then expressed, and are, therefore, now promptly and respectfully submitted to the consideration of the Committees of Ways and Means and on Finance in the two Houses.

The amount of means authorized might judiciously extend to the five or six millions which have usually been kept on hand in former years, as a balance to cover all contingencies and fluctuations, and it might be used as a substitute for that balance whenever the public wants should require during the year, and be all reimbursed before its close, if the revenue increases in the latter part of the year as is anticipated in the annual report.

My opinion, formerly expressed, on the most convenient and economical mode of making such a temporary provision, remains unchanged in favor of an issue of Treasury notes, to be redeemed out of the revenue received before the end of the year, and to be provided for either by an amendment to some appropriate bill, or by a separate act of Congress.

Respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To Hon. J. W. JONES,
Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, H. R.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Comptroller's Office, December 17, 1840.

SIR: The Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Maryland having, at the November term, 1840, declared "soda ash" to be exempt from duty, I have to inform you, that I have directed to be refunded the duties paid under protest on that article as carbonate of soda.

I beg to request your instructions on the matter presented in the enclosed copies of letters from the district attorney and collector of the customs at Boston, in relation to recent decisions of the United States court in that city. If those decisions are acquiesced in by the department, (and I know not, after the expressed opinion of the district attorney, how they can be resisted,) the free admission of "gunny cloth" may materially interfere with, if not totally destroy, the domestic manufacture of cotton bagging. The honorable Mr. Clay, of the Senate, having, during the last session of Congress, called the particular attention of the department to this subject, I have thought it proper to submit it, in its present position, to your special notice.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. N. BARKER, Comptroller.
Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Comptroller's Office, December 18, 1840.

SIR: By a communication from the collector at New York, dated the 13th instant, a copy of which is herewith enclosed, it appears that the article worsted plush is added to the list of goods (heretofore paying goods under the construction of law by this department) exempted from duty by the decisions of the United States courts.

Before instructing the collector to refund duties paid under protest on this article, I have thought it proper, as in former cases, to submit the subject for your decision and sanction.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J. N. BARKER,
Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Comptroller.
Secretary of the Treasury.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, New York, December 18, 1840.

SIR: The Messrs. Woolsey made an entry of refined sugar to-day, the bounty on which will be between seventy and eighty thousand dollars, if the vessel by which it is to be exported has sufficient capacity to take it all.

I have before called your attention to the important fact of the refiners having an advantage in this respect which I am quite sure the policy of the Government did not intend to confer, though Congress, by its legislation, has conferred it.

To illustrate the proposition, I will make below the calculation of duty on 100 pounds of sugar imported, costing, in a foreign port, four and a half cents,

100 pounds, at two and a half cents per pound duty,	$2 50
Deduct, under compromise act, forty per cent.	1 00
	1 50
Add eight per cent. on cost, say $4 50,	36
Actual duty on 100 pounds brown sugar,	$1 86

The bounty, or drawback, on refined sugar, is five cents per pound, and has been so since 1829; at which time the duty on importation of raw sugar was three cents per pound, or three dollars the hundred pounds; which now is but $1 86 the hundred pounds: making a difference in the duty, between now and 1829, when the present bounty was fixed, of one dollar and fourteen cents on a hundred pounds.

The quantity imported into this district the three first quarters of this year was thirty-seven million six hundred and twelve thousand six hundred and twenty-three pounds, (say 37,612,623 pounds;) the difference on the duties upon which, at this time, compared with the duty in 1829, when the present bounty was increased, amounts to $428,783 90.

As the refiners were willing to do business upon the basis the law placed that business in 1829, it seems to me that Congress ought now to interfere.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

J. HOYT, Collector.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
January 7, 1841.

SIR: I enclose, for the consideration of your committee, the copy of another letter from the collector of New York, concerning the large and unexpected amount of drawbacks paid and paying at that port. Other large drawbacks of this kind are demanded at Boston occasionally.

Coupling these payments with others before detailed to the committee, for refunding duties under recent judicial decisions, with the great demands for fishing bounties, the debt of this District, the census, pensions, Florida war, &c. (most of them referred to in the tenth and eleventh pages of my annual report,) and I do not see how it is possible to preserve the public faith in respect to them, and the other large current expenses of an ordinary character, without the additional means desired in that report to be furnished at an early day.

As more than a month has transpired since this was first desired and explained, any further delay will place the Department in daily jeopardy of not being able, at certain points, to raise available means sufficient to meet the public engagements at those points.

I trust, therefore, that the committee will excuse me for urging the speediest action possible on this important subject. Respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JOHN W. JONES,
Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, New York, Jan. 5, 1841.

SIR: I am glad to learn that the question of bounty on refined sugar has been submitted to a committee of Congress.

We paid the Messrs. Woolsey to-day another bounty of over $25,000; and one will mature in a few days for three times the amount.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. HOYT, Collector.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

After some remarks from Mr. CUSHING, in which he discussed the propriety of making provision for the coming Administration, the motion for making the bill of Mr. ADAMS the special order for the 27th instant, having been made, the yeas and nays were demanded, and, being ordered, recited as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Boardman, Botts, Briggs, Calhoun, Carter, Casey, Connor, Crabb, Cranston, Cushing, Edward Davies, John Davis, Garrett Davis, Deberry, Dellet, Edwards, Fillmore, Galbraith, Granger, Graves, Grinnell, Hawes, Hoffman, James, Jenifer, Wm. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Winthrop—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Linn Banks, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Chapman, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Crary, Cross, Dana, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Garland, Goggin, Graham, Hand, John Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, John W. Jones, Kille, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lucas, Meredith Mallory, Medill, Paynter, Pickens, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Strong, Sumter, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Vanderpool, Watterson, and Wise—52.

And there being no quorum,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, January 14, 1841.

The PRESIDENT submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the following resolution submitted by Mr. TALLMADGE on the 31st December last:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to the Senate a list of the drafts drawn by the Treasury Department, or by its order, that—between the 28th day of February, 1839, and the 4th day of July last, and also since the 4th day of July last—have been protested for non-payment, or that have been presented for payment, and remain unpaid; exhibiting in a tabular form, the date of such draft, the names of the payees, the names and office of the drawees; the place where payable; the time when payable; the amount; the time when presented, and the time when protested.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial of inhabitants of Wood county, Ohio, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial of citizens of New York for the same purpose.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from citizens of Washington county, New York, for the same purpose.

These memorials, as a bill had already been reported in concurrence with the prayer of the petitioners, were laid on the table.

Mr. WHITE presented the petition of inhabitants of Indiana, praying the establishment a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF ALABAMA ADVERSE TO A PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama; which were read:

Preamble and Resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, responsive to certain resolutions of the State of Connecticut in favor of the protective policy.

Certain resolutions of the State of Connecticut have been communicated by the Governor of this State to this General Assembly, agreeably to a request contained in said resolutions which express sentiments in favor of what they designate "the protective policy of our Government," and contain a request to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from said States, to resist, by all constitutional means, every attempt to destroy or impair said policy, and to use their exertions to procure the passage of such laws as will effectually protect the labor of this country from the policy and legislation of foreign Governments; the said resolutions further signify, that it is the wish of our sister State to obtain from us an expression of our sentiments on the subject to which her said resolutions relate.

It becomes us in courtesy, under such circumstances, to make answers, which we proceed respectfully to do, as follows:

We presume we properly comprehend the State of Connecticut as intending, by the words "protective policy of our Government," in her aforesaid resolutions, a protective tariff; and by the words "labor of this country," the manufacturing labor of this country. So understanding our sister State, we cannot forbear expressing our surprise and regret to find that she should feel it incumbent on her to press this fruitful source of discord and distraction upon the attention of Alabama and the South, at this time—two years in advance of the expiration of that "compromise" which has, for a period, allayed the fierce and angry passions to which "the" protective policy had heretofore given rise. But as she has thought proper to call upon us for our sentiments on this subject, we proceed to give them fully embodied in the following resolutions—the principles of which, we would kindly, but firmly, admonish our sister Connecticut that we are determined to maintain at every hazard.

Be it therefore resolved unanimously, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama in General Assembly convened, That the Government of the United States was established in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare, to, and among the several separate and sovereign States of this Union, and to secure the blessings of liberty to us and our children as citizens of said States.

SEC. 2. Resolved unanimously, That said Government never can establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, or promote the general welfare of this widely extended Union, and the diversified interests and pursuits thereof, especially in view of their peculiar relations aforesaid, by enacting laws to foster, promote, and protect the industry and occupations of one portion of the States or people, to the disparagement, injury, and expense of another.

SEC. 3. Resolved unanimously, That a tariff for the protection of manufactures always was, and always must remain, obnoxious to the objections set forth in the foregoing resolution; and that consequently, every such measure always has been, and ever will be, in our estimation, unwise, unjust, and unconstitutional.

SEC. 4. Resolved unanimously, That in the solemn and deliberate opinion of this General Assembly, a successful attempt to re-establish the "protective policy," while it cannot fail to alienate the feelings of one portion of our happy Union from another, and provoke fierce political animosities between the North and the South, ultimately and irresistibly tends to a dissolution of the Federal compact between those States, and that in view of such consequences, we earnestly and affectionately dissuade our Northern brethren from any such attempt.

SEC. 5. Resolved unanimously, That the Governor of this State be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the Governor of the State of Connecticut, and the Governors of each of the other States, and also copies to each of our Senators and Representatives, the former of whom are instructed, and the latter requested, to use all honorable and proper means to sustain the principles therein set forth.

J. L. F. COTTRELL,
President of the Senate.

R. A. BAKER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the memorial of the American Peace Society of praying that a special joint committee of Congress may be appointed to report on the various memorials from peace societies presented at the last and present sessions of Congress.

Mr. C. said that whilst every man must concur in the object of the petitioners, every one must see the difficulty attending it. The memorial asks for a special committee, and he was already so much involved in the business of the session, that he was afraid to ask for it. If any other Senator, however, felt a disposition to make the motion, he would most cheerfully vote for it. The memorial was laid on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a similar memorial, which was disposed of in the same manner.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial from citizens of Albany county, N. Y. praying for the passage of a bankrupt law, with certain designated provisions; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of merchants and other citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of a bankrupt law at the present session; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial from manufacturers, merchants, mechanics, and other persons of New York, presenting in detail the provisions of a bankrupt law, which they think would be a proper one; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the memorial of citizens of Bucksport, Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the fishing bounties and allowances; which was read.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that in a few days he would make an effort to bring this question before the Senate, when he would show that two-thirds of these fishing bounties were a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States. There is at present before Congress a proposition to borrow money by issuing Treasury notes, a portion of which must go to the payment of these fishing bounties. He repeated that he would conclusively demonstrate that to the amount of two-thirds of these allowances they were a naked bounty from the Treasury, and of course unconstitutional.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial from the heirs and legal representatives of the Chevolier de Repentigny, by C. E. Violet, their attorney; and a memorial from Agnes Slacke. The former memorial claims for the memorialists, citizens of France, jointly with Agnes Slacke, of Ireland, a tract of land at the Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, "six leagues on the portage by six leagues in depth on the river separating the two lakes." This land (said Mr. NORVELL) is alleged to have been granted as a concession, in 1750, by the French Canadian authorities, to Captain de Bonne and the Chevalier de Repentigny, for the purpose of establishing thereon a seignory. The grant is further stated to have been ratified by the King of France in 1751. Agnes Slacke derives her claim to a moiety of this concession from sales or grants made by Captain de Bonne. Mr. NORVELL said that he had presented these memorials by request. He considered them as important to the claimants, important in their consequences to the State of Michigan, and important to the United States. He therefore moved that they be printed, and, with the papers which accompanied them, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. He would ask the particular attention of that committee to the subject, with as speedy action and as early a decision on it as might be consistent with their convenience.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the petition and papers of Joshua Kennedy, as assignee of Laurendine, and of the heirs of Joshua Kennedy, now on file, were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Huldah Tucker; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of William Rand; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. PRENTISS, the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the memorial of Robert P. Wainwright, was discharged from its further consideration, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petitions of Richard Elliot, of Isaac Hilton, of Catherine Howard, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the House bill making temporary provision for lunatics in the District of Columbia, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill for regulating commercial intercourse between the port of Cayenne, in the colony of French Guiana, and to remit certain duties; and

The bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund duties collected on the French ship Alexandre; reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LINN, from the Select Committee to which was referred the joint resolution to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, and for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same, reported the same without amendment.

The joint resolution directing the transfer to the State of Maryland of the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, standing in the name of the United States, upon certain conditions, was then taken up.

Mr. MANGUM said, as this matter was of much importance to the citizens of the District, who had no representative here, and as a remonstrance against the passage of the bill, which he had presented some days since, had not yet returned from the printer, he hoped the further consideration of the bill would be postponed for a few days.

Mr. MERRICK urged the immediate action of the Senate as necessary to enable the Legislature of Maryland, who had the subject at this moment under consideration, to enable them to act understandingly. The stock at present was of no value, and Congress having in their wisdom determined to make no further appropriations to complete the work, their holding on to the stock only operated to deter Maryland from making efforts to complete the canal to Cumberland. As to the memorial of the corporate authorities of Washington, it was only remonstrating against the United States disposing of their own property, with which they had no more right to interfere than the citizens of any other portions of the Republic.

Mr. WALKER said several years since he had introduced a bill, somewhat similar to that now pending for the relinquishment of our stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the State of Maryland. He had done this after a conference with a distinguished patriot, [Governor KENT,] then a Senator from Maryland, but now called to a higher and better world. At that time, he (Mr. WALKER) had called upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report what dividends the Government of the United States had received from its stock in all these canals, namely, this canal, the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, the Dismal Swamp Canal, and the Ohio Canal at Louisville. The report then made showed that these stocks, with the exception of the last, had never yielded any dividend; that they had no market price, and in all probability never would yield any dividend, especially this stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. Under these circumstances, Mr. WALKER said he was in favor of dissolving this unprofitable partnership between this Government and this company, by the surrender of this stock to the State of Maryland. Mr. WALKER said whoever would read the early debates and reports on this subject in both Houses of Congress, could not fail to observe, that this Government had originally intended to proceed, pari passu with the State of Maryland, in subscriptions to this canal, considering it as a great national work, terminating in this District. This design was now abandoned, most happily, together with the whole internal improvement system by Congress; but, in the mean time, the State of Maryland, relying on the continued co-operation of this Government in the construction of this canal, had proceeded and expended enormous sums towards the completion of this great work; and whilst he (Mr. WALKER) would not, even under these circumstances, vote to appropriate more money to this or any other similar object of internal improvement by this Government, yet he thought it a mere act of justice to surrender this stock, (not without an equivalent,) but for the full equivalent provided in this bill, namely: the use of this canal forever, free of all toll, for the transportation of the troops and munitions of war of this Government; and upon similar terms Mr. WALKER was willing to surrender to the States in which they were located, all the stock he'd by this Government in all other canals, and thus to complete the divorce between this Government and the whole internal improvement system. In relation to the stock held by this Government in the Louisville canal, Mr. WALKER desired to cede our stock in that canal to the State of Kentucky, so as to be made auxiliary to the great object of rendering that canal free of all toll, and thus remove that heavy taxation which was now imposed on those who travelled or transported products on the Ohio river. In relation to the opposition on the part of this city to this transfer, Mr. W. said he regretted it. The completion of this canal by Maryland would be of vast importance to this city, and she ought to support this bill as facilitating the completion of this work; and as to the idea that Maryland might, by obtaining the control of this stock, abandon the canal to this city, by carrying the canal from a point out of this District to Baltimore, it was delusive. Now, Mr. W. said, a survey for Maryland, by the accomplished head of our Topographical Bureau, had been made, by which it was demonstrated that all other routes for a cross cut from this canal to Baltimore had been found impracticable, except through this city. Mr. W. said that this bill had passed the Senate at the last session by a large majority, and he hoped it would now be permitted to pass without delay.

On motion of Mr. CLAY by Alabama, the for taking up the special order having arrived joint resolution was laid on the table.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN to the motion to recommit the bill made by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. SEVIER addressed the Senate at length in favor of the amendment submitted by Mr. CALHOUN, and of the original bill, and in opposition to the substitute proposed by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana followed in opposition to Mr. CALHOUN's amendment, and spoke for about an hour, when, without concluding, he yielded to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, January 14, 1841.

After the journal had been read,

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the motion of Mr. ADAMS to make House bill No. 311, providing for a duty on the special order of the day for the 27th instant (The question on this motion had been put on last evening, but no quorum voted.)

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House, but there was no second.

The question then being on the motion to make the bill the special order,

Mr. THOMPSON asked for the reading of the bill, and it was read accordingly.

Mr. WISE desired to know if it would require two-thirds to make it the special order.

The SPEAKER said it would.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. ADAMS, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Boardman, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garrett Davis, Deberry, Dellet, Doe, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, Fornance, Galbraith, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Goode, Granger, Green, Hall, Henry, Charles Johnston, Lane, Lincoln, McCarty, McClure, McCulloch, McKay, Francis Mallory, Mason, Moore, Morrow, Osborne, Parmenter, Paynter, Peck, Randall, Bariden, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, John Smith, Truman Smith, Stanley, Stuart, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, and John T. H. Worthington.—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, Atherton, Banks, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Crary, Dana, Dawson, Dickerson, Doane, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Fine, Fisher, Garland, Goggin, Griffin, Hammond, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of Va. Hubbard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Kille, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Nisbet, Parrish, Pickens, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sweeney, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Vanderpoel, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, and Wise—65.

So there not being two-thirds, the motion was not agreed to.

The report of the Committee of Elections relative to the PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION, then coming up as the special order, and Mr. NAYLOR being entitled to the floor,

Mr. RIVES, chairman of the Committee of Elections, asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give way a moment in order to afford him (Mr. R.) an opportunity of renewing the following motion ineffectually made some days ago by the former chairman of that committee, Mr. CAMPBELL:

Resolved, That the SPEAKER of this House be requested to issue a subpoena duces tecum to Samuel Hart, esq. prothonotary of the court of common pleas for the city and county of Philadelphia, directing the said Samuel Hart, esq. to appear personally, or by deputy, before this House, at one o'clock, p. m. on Monday the 18th instant, with the election returns and other papers on file in his office, relating to the Congressional election in the Third Congressional District in the State of Pennsylvania in 1838, there to be examined in evidence in the case of contested election now pending between C. J. INGERSOLL and CHARLES NAYLOR, from the said Congressional district.

Mr. STANLY objected to the floor being given by Mr. NAYLOR.

Mr. RIVES hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would not object, as it was important that the papers required by the resolution should be had in season.

Mr. STANLY persisted.

[It will be recollected that it was Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, at the last session, who, a few days ago, attempted, on two occasions, to introduce the above resolution, Mr. C. being, as we are informed, in favor of the majority report. Both times objection was made by Messrs. STANLY, WILLIAMS, and other opposition members, who, it appears, have no desire that Hart should appear with the election returns, although they were called for by Mr. CAMPBELL, who, it appears, is in favor of Mr. NAYLOR. If the Whigs objected to the motion of one in favor of the majority report, it was hardly to be expected they would give way to the motion when made by a signer of the minority report.]

Mr. NAYLOR said he had not the slightest objection to the passage of that resolution; but inasmuch as the House had twice refused to entertain it, he did not deem it very respectful to again press it.

Mr. RIVES explained that it was a mistake to say that any vote had been taken on the resolution, for it had not yet been received.

Mr. NAYLOR persisted in his refusal, and was about to proceed, when

Mr. JONES of Virginia hoped the gentleman would yield the floor for one moment only, just to enable him to move that the Treasury note bill be made the special order for Monday next. Mr. J. observed that the condition of the Treasury was one which required immediate relief. The motion would take but a moment; and he trusted the gentleman would permit it to be made.

Mr. NAYLOR said if he gave way for one, he must for a dozen; so he must decline.

Mr. N. then proceeded with his remarks in answer to Mr. INGERSOLL.

After speaking until after three o'clock, Mr. N. concluded, and resumed his seat.

Mr. GREEN of Kentucky then asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency and necessity of laying such duties, for the purposes of revenue, upon wines and silks, and such other articles of luxury imported into the United States, as will meet the necessary expenditures of the Government, and pay off the debt already incurred by the issue of Treasury notes, and all such other debts as may be owing by the Government of the United States; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to adjourn; but, after some conversation, the motion was withdrawn.

The question then being on the resolution of Mr. GREEN, Objection was made to its reception; whereupon, Mr. GREEN moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE rose to a question of order. He desired to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] was not entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER informed him that Mr. N. had concluded his remarks.

Mr. RIVES presumed that the consideration of the contested election case would still go on as the special order.

The SPEAKER said certainly it would, and the other claimant (Mr. INGERSOLL) was entitled to the floor; the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, therefore, could only be entertained by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. JONES of Virginia wished to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, whether the bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures, for imposing a duty on foreign silks, did not cover this resolution.

Mr. ADAMS replied that it would cover only a part of the resolution, namely, so far as related to silks.

The SPEAKER had observed that it was not in order to debate that question.

Mr. WISE did not wish to speak out of order, but would merely observe, that although the bill reported from the Committee on Manufactures referred only to silks, yet it was open to amendment and might thus be made to cover the whole ground.

The question on the motion to suspend the rules was then put, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Boardman, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chittenden, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, John Davis, Garrett Davis, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, Fornance, Galbraith, Gates, Goode, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lane, Leet, Lincoln, McCulloch, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Morrow, Naylor, Osborne, Paken, Peck, Randall, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Winthrop—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, William R. Cooper, Crary, Cross, Dana, John W. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Goggin, Graham, Griffin, Hammond, John Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Josiah Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McClure, McKay, Francis Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parmenter, Pickens, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Weller, and Wise—86.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. JONES of Virginia, then asked the permission of Mr. INGERSOLL to permit him to offer a resolution, making the Treasury note bill the special order for Monday next, and for each succeeding day until it shall be finally disposed of.

And Mr. INGERSOLL assenting, Mr. JONES submitted the motion.

Mr. BARNARD moved to amend the motion as follows:

That the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill in relation to Treasury notes, and that the subject of making provision for the wants of the Treasury be referred back to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions—

1. To bring in a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow ten millions of dollars on the credit of the Government, and to issue bonds or scrip therefor.

2. To bring in a bill imposing additional revenue on wines, silks, linens, spices, and other articles, being luxuries, imported into the United States, but in such manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy, and spirit of the act of 2d March, 1833, commonly called the "compromise act."

The SPEAKER decided that the amendment could not be received, as a motion to make a bill the special order did not open the merits of such bill.

Mr. BARNARD dissented from the opinion of the CHAIR, but did not appeal from the decision.

Mr. JONES of Virginia then demanded the yeas and nays on his motion, which were ordered.

Mr. DAWSON wished to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether the money required by the Treasury Note bill was wanted for immediate use.

Mr. JONES replied that a considerable proportion of the money would be required to meet demands upon the Treasury during the first quarter of the present year. A large portion was also required to pay pensions which would fall due after the 4th of March. Likewise to meet other demands which would fall due between this time and that period.

In reply to a further question by Mr. Dawson, Mr. JONES observed that it was proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means to make provision for all the wants of the Government during the present year up to the first of January next. And for himself, judging from the report of the Secretary, he believed that the means for the year would be sufficient to meet the expenditures. But, owing to the inequality of receipts and expenditures at different portions of the year, it was essentially necessary that a temporary provision should be made to enable the Treasury to meet demands upon it during the present quarter, and to transport money to remote quarters where it would be immediately required after the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. BARNARD wished to know what was the motion before the House.

The SPEAKER said it was the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] to make the Treasury note bill the special order for Monday next, which motion would require a vote of two-thirds.

After some debate of a conversational character between Messrs. BARNARD, BRIGGS, and others, the question was taken on the motion of Mr. JONES, and it was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Atherton, Banks, Barnard, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, William R. Cooper, Crary, Cross, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dawson, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fillmore, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Garland, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hoffman, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Jenifer, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, King, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McClure, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Marvin, Medill, Miller, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Osborne, Parmenter, Peck, Pickens, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Saltonstall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Turney, Vanderpool, David D. Wagener, Weller, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Andrews, Baker, Boardman, Betts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Chittenden, Crabb, Cranston, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garrett Davis, Deberry, Edwards, Everett, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Henry, Hill of Virginia, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lane, Lincoln, Francis Mallory, Morrow, Naylor, Palen, Randall, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Simonton, Slade, Stanly, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Underwood, Warren, John White, and Thomas W. Williams—52.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, on leave, reported a bill to establish a UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY throughout the United States; which was read twice, referred to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BARNARD then moved that the bill be made the special order for this day fortnight; pending which motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,
FRIDAY, JANUARY 15, 1841.

Mr. B. also presented two memorials of merchants, manufacturers, and others, designating certain provisions which they deem important to be incorporated in any bankrupt law that may be passed.

These memorials were all ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

pers of Caleb Mitchell were permitted to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the petition of M. M. Quackenboss, now on file, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the petition of Enoch Hidden was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Samuel Norris and Frederick Saugrain of Arkansas, reported the same without amendment.

The bill to regulate the land offices in Indiana and for other purposes, was read a third time, and passed.

UNIFORM BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved that the Senate now take up the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. KING asked the honorable Senator from Kentucky whether he made the motion for the purpose of submitting an amendment to the bill, or for the purpose of discussion by the Senate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN replied, that the latter was his object, and he called for the ayes and noes on the motion.

Mr. BENTON said he considered this a motion which would go to the destruction of the pre-emption bill, and if it were adopted, he should consider the pre-emption bill voted down for this session. The adoption of a motion of that magnitude, at this short session, would be equivalent to a declaration that the Senate would not again touch the pre-emption bill this session, and therefore he should vote against it.

Mr. WALKER was not willing that any Senator, whether friend or foe, should create an issue for him, or dictate his course here on this subject. He was in favor of a pre-emption law; he was also in favor of the cession bill; but much as he favored both, he knew there was no bill ever introduced into this body, in regard to a speedy action on which his constituents were so unanimous, as on the bankrupt bill. In the State of Mississippi, all parties, Whigs and Democrats, creditors as well as debtors, solvent or insolvent, were in favor of the passage of the bankrupt bill. If there was a single individual there that was opposed to it, he had not the honor of his acquaintance. Under these circumstances, he should feel it to be his duty to vote to take up the bankrupt bill; and he would go further, and say that if either the pre-emption bill or the bankrupt bill was to be delayed in its passage for want of time at the present session, he should undoubtedly prefer that the former should be delayed rather than the latter, for there was more unanimity in his State in favor of speedy action upon the latter, and more earnestness about its immediate passage; and for this reason he should vote for its being taken up. As the ayes and noes had been called on the motion made for that purpose, he had thought it proper to make these remarks.

Mr. KING was surprised at the course taken in regard to the bill which had been so long under discussion; if the motion now made should prevail, it would prevent final action on the pre-emption bill, although it had been discussed day after day, for so many days, and the discussion was now coming to a close. And yet when the bill was in that stage, a new subject was urged upon the Senate, which could not be passed at the present session without a discussion of some days. Were Senators then, in this state of affairs, in favor of throwing aside a measure already matured for final action, and every thing else, for a bill which would engage their attention so long?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, I am; for the Bankrupt bill having passed at the last session through the Senate, after several months' debate, might now be carried immediately through this body, and produce no injurious delay as to the pre-emption bill.

Mr. KING observed, the Senate had taken up a subject of great importance; it had been discussed with the calmness and with the minuteness which its importance required; and now, at the close of the discussion, it was to be thrown aside, and final action was to be avoided, that they might take up another subject that would consume much of the remaining time of the session. If the Senator from Mississippi was friendly, as he said he was, to both these measures, he (Mr. KING) should conceive he would first pass one of them, take up the other, and pass that too as soon as possible; but the course pursued by the Senator from Mississippi would appear to betray but little friendship for the pre-emption bill, if, by voting for the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, he should give it the go-by.

Mr. WALKER said he intended to give what he knew would be the vote of his constituents, if they were on that floor; and notwithstanding the surprise of the honorable Senator from Alabama, he should persist in his intention to vote for taking up the bankrupt bill, whenever a motion was made to take it up, and to give it the precedence of all other bills on the calendar. His constituents were more deeply interested in the immediate passage of the bankrupt bill than any other. They were in favor of a pre-emption bill, and so was he; they were in favor of the cession bill, and so was he; but they were more deeply interested in passing the bankrupt bill at the present session.

Mr. BENTON. But one is ripe for final action.

Mr. WALKER. And so is the other, and had already passed the Senate at the last session, and he hoped could now pass the Senate without delay; and it seemed as though the debate on the pre-emption bill would be interminable.

Mr. YOUNG said it was known at the last session that he was in favor of the bankrupt bill, but he was not willing to give it precedence of all other bills. He was willing to give it precedence of all other business after the disposal of that which had been so long under discussion.

Mr. BENTON said the graduation bill was the next in order after the pre-emption bill; and as they had been discussed together, it was desirable that they should be disposed of together. But if they were to be thrown aside, and killed by a side blow, it was perfectly immaterial whether the blow came from friend or foe; death was death, come the blow whence it might. To throw, then, those bills by, after they had had a full discussion—for the discussion had gone to both—and to take up one of the magnitude of the bankrupt bill, on which several Senators would have something to say, was to throw them by altogether, and to kill them by a side blow.

Mr. LUMPKIN should vote against postponing the bills already discussed, to give precedence to the bankrupt bill; but he had no hesitation in saying that the Senate had abundance of time to act, and to act deliberately, on every subject then before the Senate. He should thus vote, because one important measure was ready for decision; and he acted on this principle, that when he had many things to do, he would do one thing at a time; and he would do the most important first.

Mr. WALKER had not made the motion then before the Senate, nor was he aware that the Senator from Kentucky was about to make it; but it having been made, he should give such a vote as his constituents would give if they were on this floor. He knew his constituents preferred immediate action on the bankrupt bill, and that delay, as to the passage of that bill, would be more injurious to them than delay as to any other measure; but he should not have made any remarks, if the proposition of compromise suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, to take up the bankrupt bill immediately after the pre-emption bill, had not been rejected by the opponents of the bankrupt bill, and a disposition manifested to prevent any action on that bill at this session. He said he had no fear that his constituents would misapprehend his course on this subject, or that any Senator on this floor could induce any one citizen of Mississippi to believe that he was taking a course hostile to the pre-emption system. The first act ever introduced by him into the Senate, immediately after taking his seat, was a bill containing a prospective pre-emption clause, and he had accompanied that bill with an elaborate report in its favor. At every subsequent session he had introduced a prospective bill, and in 1837 such a principle had received the assent of a majority of the Senate. He hoped both the pre-emption and bankrupt bill would pass at the present session; but the pre-emption bill would benefit his constituents as much if passed a few months hence, as now; but if action were delayed much longer on the bankrupt bill, it would be of little use to debtor or creditor in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. BENTON observed that the graduation bill was the next in order.

Mr. WALKER said that would be death to the bankrupt bill, and therefore he felt bound to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, though he should prefer such a modification of the motion as would give it precedence after the disposal of the bill which was ready to be disposed of, and that bill were pressed to an immediate vote.

Mr. HUBBARD was opposed, as was well known, to the bankrupt bill—he had never received even the first memorial from his own State for such a bill—but, from the last remark of the Senator from Mississippi, it would appear they were to have but one measure during the present session, and that measure was to be the bankrupt bill. Now he (Mr. HUBBARD) was in favor of both the pre-emption and graduation bills, and he sustained them in consonance with resolutions from his own State; and to him it appeared that they ought to act on the bill before them, (the pre-emption bill.) At the last session of Congress the Senate passed a bankrupt bill, and the House to which it was then sent for consideration had it now again under consideration; but what was the course adopted with it there (in the House of Representatives?) Why, it was even refused a consideration—it was not even referred to a committee—by a majority of seventeen. What would be its fate now, he (Mr. HUBBARD) knew not, but it would be an economy of time to wait for the action of the other House upon that bill, and therefore he hoped that the pre-emption bill would not be postponed.

Mr. WALKER endeavored to discharge his duty to his constituents, but he would agree to make the bankrupt bill the special order next after the pre-emption bill, if that compromise were assented to, and no other business then taken up till the bankrupt bill was passed.

Mr. HUBBARD said that would not be in order.

Mr. KING said it could not be made the special order next after the pre-emption bill; it could only be got at by postponing the other special orders.

Mr. NORVELL was in favor of both bills; and as the question now stood, he felt himself placed in a predicament, for he did not wish his vote to be misunderstood, and therefore if the bankrupt bill could be made the special order next after the pre-emption bill, he should be glad that arrangement were made.

Mr. CRITTENDEN did not understand why should not be made the special order next after the pre-emption bill.

Mr. CALHOUN said gentlemen might get at the bankrupt bill in one of two ways. It might be done by moving to discharge it from the special orders and put it on the general orders, and then it could be taken up at any time. The other mode was, to wait until one o'clock and then move the postponement of all special and general orders, to take up this bill. These were the only parliamentary modes of reaching it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN perfectly understood his position; he understood that a majority of the Senate had the right to make what order they pleased.

After some other observations from several Senators,

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he did not wish to embarrass any of the friends of the bill, and with the consent of the Senate, he would now withdraw his motion, but gave notice that he would renew it, and persist in it, as soon as the measure under consideration was disposed of.

Mr. KING. That is right.

Mr. BENTON. That is parliamentary.

The motion was then, by unanimous consent, withdrawn.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN to the motion to recommit the bill made by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana resumed and continued his remarks in opposition to the amendment of Mr. CALHOUN, and in favor of the distribution bill.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MERRICK then moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed, and that the Senate take up the bill for the re-charter of the Banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said if it was important to get the bill to which the honorable Senator from Maryland referred, before the other branch of Congress, it was much more important—it was all important, to act definitely as soon as possible on the bill the gentleman desired to postpone. He was sorry that the gentleman should think it necessary to occupy so much of the time of the Senate with motions to advance some and to thrust aside other measures. After some other observations he moved to lay the motion of the Senator from Maryland on the table.

Mr. MERRICK called for the ayes and noes thereon, which were ordered; and the motion of the Senator from Alabama was decided in the affirmative—ayes 25, noes 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Ky., Clayton, Crittenden, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, and White—15.

Mr. SOUTHARD then rose, and addressed the Senate in opposition to the amendment proposed by Mr. CALHOUN; but before concluding, gave way to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, January 15, 1841.

After the journal had been read,

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the motion to make the bill to establish

A UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY, the special order for the 28th of the present month, and on which the yeas and nays had been ordered; and pending which motion, the House had adjourned.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and were, yeas 57, nays 96, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Baker, Barnard, Boardman, Bond, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Cranston, Cushing, Edward Davies, Dawson, Dellet, Edwards, Galbraith, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Grinnell, Hand, Henry, Hoffman, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, Meredith Mallory, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Nisbet, Osborne, Peck, Randall, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Strong, Stuart, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, David D. Wagoner, T. W. Williams, and Winthrop—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boats, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, John Campbell, Carroll, Casey, Clifford, Connor, W. R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Deberry, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Gariand, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Griffin, Habersham, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kile, Lane, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McClure, McCulloch, McKay Francis Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Montany, Montgomery, Morris, Parrish, Paynter, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Proff, Rariden, Rayner, Reynolds, Rives, James Roger, Russell, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Swearingen, Sweney, Taliaferro, F. Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Warren, Watterson, Weller, J. W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Wise—96.

So the House refused to make bill the special order for the 28th instant.

Mr. INGERSOLL was then about to proceed, when

Mr. RIVES hoped the gentleman would yield the floor for one moment, in order that he might offer the following resolution, calling for papers connected with the case:

Resolved, That the SPEAKER of this House be requested to issue a subpoena duces tecum to Samuel Hart, esq. prothonotary of the court of common pleas for the city and county of Philadelphia, directing the said Samuel Hart, esq. to appear personally, or by deputy, before this House, at one o'clock, p. m. on Monday, the 18th instant, with the election returns and other papers on file in his office, relating to the Congressional election in the Third Congressional District in the State of Pennsylvania in 1838, there to be examined in evidence in the case of contested election now pending between C. J. INGERSOLL and CHARLES NAYLOR, from the said Congressional District.

Mr. WISE objecting,

Mr. RIVES said if the gentleman from Pennsylvania would give him the floor, he would move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER observed that if any member objected, the gentleman from Pennsylvania could not yield the floor.

Mr. RIVES was again about to urge his request, when

Mr. WISE called him to order.

Mr. INGERSOLL then proceeded in his reply to the arguments of Mr. NAYLOR, and having concluded at a quarter past two o'clock,

Mr. NAYLOR made a brief rejoinder, after which, the question pending being on the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections, declaring Mr. NAYLOR to have been duly elected—

Mr. JAMESON believing that no good would arise from further discussion, moved the previous question.

Mr. MEDILL, a member of the Committee of Elections, hoped the gentleman would withdraw the call for the previous question, as he wished to offer—(The confusion which prevailed prevented the Reporter from hearing the remainder of the sentence.)

Mr. WISE hoped the Committee of Elections would be permitted to say any thing they thought proper on the subject.

Mr. JAMESON said he regretted that his sense of duty would not permit him to withdraw the call for the previous question; for if the committee were permitted to give their views, other members would wish to reply, and there would be no knowing where the discussion and excitement would end. He therefore persisted in his demand for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was then recorded by the House, and the main question, on agreeing to the resolution of the committee, ordered to be put.

Mr. FILLMORE, after observing that but few members were in their seats, moved a call of the House.

The SPEAKER said that a motion for a call of the House could not be entertained after the previous question had been ordered.

At the request of several members, the resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That CHARLES NAYLOR was duly elected a member of the House of Representatives for the Twenty-sixth Congress, from the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania.

There not being a full attendance of members, and it not being in order to move a call of the House,

Mr. VANDERPOEL thought that, as this was an important question, the better plan would be to adjourn, and take the vote in the morning, when there might be a full House. He therefore made that motion.

Mr. WISE asked if the time when the motion was made (half past two) would be entered on the journal.

The SREAKER said it would.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Burke, Clifford, Coles, Wm. R. Cooper, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, Dickerson, Doan, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Everett, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hubbard, Jameson, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lowell, Marchand, Medill, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Parrish, Parmenter, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, Rogers, Shaw, Thomas Smith, Strong, Taylor, P. F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Boardman, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Aaron V. Brown, Sampson H. Butler, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Connor, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Doe, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, Fisher, Garland, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Griffin, Habersham, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, James, Jenifer, Chas. Johnston, Joseph Johnson, Wm. Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Kempshall, King, Lane, Lincoln, Lucas, McClellan, McClure, McCulloch, McKay, Francis Mallory, Marvin, Miller, Monroe, Moore, Morgan, Nisbet, Palen, Paynter, Peck, Randall, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, James Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Samuels, Sergeant, Albert Smith, Truman Smith, Stanly, Suenrod, Stuart, Sumter, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Weller, John White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, and Wise—111.

So the House refused to adjourn.

And the question recurring on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. FILLMORE observed, it was highly desirable that there should be a full attendance before the vote was taken, and he hoped the House would consent to a call.

The SPEAKER said that such a motion could be entertained only by general consent, as it was not permitted by the rules.

And there being no objection,

Mr. FILLMORE moved that there be a call of the House; which motion was seconded, and a call ordered.

The CLERK called the roll; when 194 members answered to their names.

The doors were then closed, and the Clerk directed to call the names of the absentees.

Mr. MASON moved that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with, and on that motion.

Mr. ATHERTON demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken were YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Blackwell, Boardman, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Coles, Connor, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, John W. Davis, Garrett Davis, Deberry, Dellet, Doan, Doe, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, Fisher, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hoffman, Hubbard, Hunt, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lane, Lincoln, Francis Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Beatty, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, Clifford, W. R. Cooper, Cross, Dana, Thomas Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Dickerson, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Everett, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Goode, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hillen, Hopkins, James, Jameson, Kille, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McClure, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Toland, Turney, Vanderpoel, Weller, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—66.

So all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

The resolution was again read; after which

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio moved to adjourn, but the motion was negatived by tellers as follows: yeas 86, nays 106.

Mr. WATTERSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE desired to know whether, in case the motion to lay on the table should prevail, the sitting member, Mr. NAYLOR, would not remain in his seat.

The SPEAKER said that would be the effect of the motion, should it prevail.

Mr. JENIFER wished to know whether, this being a privileged question, it could not be again called up at any time.

The SPEAKER said it could.

The motion to lay on the table was then withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, J. W. Allen, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Boardman, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, S. H. Butler, W. O. Butler, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, John W. NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Beatty, Blackwell, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Bynum, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Wm. R. Cooper, Crary, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hillen, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanperpoel, D. D. Wagener, Waterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—85.

So Mr. NAYLOR was declared to have been duly elected, and, as such, entitled to a seat until the close of the present Congress.

The House then adjourned.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky submitted the following resolutions, which were considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the plan of a permanent change in the tariff, the details and general principles of which he states, in his annual report of the 7th ultimo, he has considered, and on which he is ready to report, at any moment either House of Congress might express a wish to that effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be also directed to report, as soon as practicable, a plan of assessing the value of goods, wares, and merchandise in the ports of the United States instead of foreign countries.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the registering and enrolment of such foreign ships as shall be sold to American citizens under the order or decree of any court of the United States, made on process of law, though the same may not have been built in the U. States.

Mr. TAPPAN submitted the following resolution for consideration, which lays over:

Resolved, That the Senate will proceed, on Monday next, at one o'clock, to elect a Sergeant-at-Arms in the place of Stephen Haight, esq. deceased.

SUGAR AND RUM DRAWBACKS, AND FISHING BOUNTIES AND ALLOWANCES.

Mr. BENTON rose to submit a resolution in relation to drawbacks on exported refined sugar and rum, manufactured out of foreign materials, and in relation to the fishing bounties and allowances; and as it was a subject on which he had heretofore moved, and that frequently, without effect, he said he felt it to be incumbent upon him to give some reasons to the Senate for again venturing to trouble them with it. Undismayed by former miscarriages, he would go on with his efforts, whether sterile or successful, until the evils were cured, or until his Senatorial service ceased; and he felt very certain of making out a case for legislative interference, whether he succeeded in procuring it or not. His resolution embraced three points of abuse, and he would take them up singly, in order to present his remarks with more distinctness and precision.

He began with the sugar drawback. He said it was now twelve years since our erroneous legislation began on that point, and he had the fate or fortune at that time to point out the error and to predict its consequences. This was in the year 1828, when the drawback on exported refined sugar, without any increase of duty on the foreign article out of which it was manufactured, was increased twenty per cent; that is to say, was raised from four cents to five cents a pound, the duty on imported brown sugar remaining at three cents a pound. To this increase he then objected, on the ground that it would restore more duty, in the shape of drawback, than had been paid on the imported sugar; that this excess of duty would be a naked bounty out of the Treasury on a manufactured article, and that the consequence would be a great increase in the importation of foreign sugar, to the prejudice of the home production, and a great increase in the amount of drawback paid, to the injury of the Treasury. These were the objections which he made to the act of 1828, and the proof of their correctness was quickly forthcoming. The increase in the imports of brown sugar nearly doubled in five years; it rose from 50,000,000 of pounds to 90,000,000. The increase in the drawbacks exceeded all calculation: it rose in three years from about $2,000 (to be precise, $2,045) to $84,230! Such was the fruit of the first error committed in 1828.

The second error was committed seven years ago; it was committed in the famous compromise act of 1833. That act provided for a reduction of duties on all imported articles, to be made periodically, and to be brought down in 1842 to an ad valorem of 20 per centum, but it made no provision for a corresponding reduction of drawbacks, when the imported article was exported in a manufactured or altered shape. Looking upon this defect as an oversight in the framers of the bill, he ventured to propose an amendment to remedy the omission, when the bill was before the Senate. He submitted an amendment; it was voted upon by the Senate, and rejected. The compromise bill then went into operation, and gave increased vigor to the error of 1833. It increased the sugar importations in six years from near one hundred millions to near two hundred millions of pounds; and it increased the drawback from about $80,000 to upwards of $600,000. The amount paid in 1840 was $611,000; with an indication of inordinate increase—the amount of $75,000, being already drawn by a single refiner (Woolsey) at a single city (New York) in the first ten days of the present year. As the sugar duty is now reduced 40 per cent. under the compromise act, and the drawback was already too high by 20 per cent. under the act of 1828, it follows that six-tenths of all the drawback on refined sugar exported last year, was a naked bounty of the Treasury, in flagrant violation of the Constitution, to the great enrichment of a few individuals, and to the deep injury of the Treasury. Justice to the Constitution and the Treasury requires this evil to be stopped; it has certainly reached a point high enough to arrest the attention of the Legislature, and to command a remedy. If it has not, it will by next year, when the drawback will become nearly all clear bounty—when near two millions of dollars will be required to pay it—when the whole sugar revenue of the Union will be inadequate to the payment—and when moneys must be borrowed, or raised by other taxes, to meet the demand.

The next article he would mention was that of the rum drawback. It was small, in comparison to the drawback on sugar, but was still an evil deserving of legislative interposition. The error in this article began in the compromise act, and had been running on since its passage. The amendment which he then offered, and which he had referred to, was intended to embrace the rum, as well as the sugar drawback. It was rejected by the Senate; and consequently, as the duty on molasses went down, and the drawback remained stationary, a part of the drawback became clear bounty, and stimulated the distiller to earn more of it. The drawback on exported rum has, therefore, increased ten or twenty fold: it has risen from one or two thousand dollars to $22,000. The molasses duty being reduced about 40 per centum, it resulted that four-tenths of this drawback was a naked bounty out of the Treasury, and to that extent was a violation of the Constitution, as well as a pecuniary loss. After 1842, if nothing is done, four-fifths of this rum drawback will be naked bounty.

The third and last article which he took up was the fishing bounties and allowances. The erroneous legislation on this point commenced, he said, in the year 1830, when the duty on salt was reduced one-half (by two annual reductions) and no corresponding reduction made in the fishing bounties and allowances founded upon that duty; and was continued by the compromise act which provided for further periodical reductions of the salt tax without any corresponding reduction of the fishing bounties and allowances. He had attempted to expose this error, and to correct it, on both these occasions, but without success. No diminution of the fishing bounties and allowances could be effected; consequently, they have been rising while the duty has been going down. The duty on salt has sunk about two-thirds, say from 20 cents per bushel to about six; the fishing bounties have risen about one-third, that is to say, from about $220,000 to about $330,000. Two-thirds of this sum ceases to be founded on the salt duty, consequently becomes a bounty act of the Treasury; and, like the excess in the sugar and rum drawbacks, becomes to that extent a gratuity from the Treasury, and an infraction of the Constitution.

For ten years the Treasury has been paying this gratuity to the cod fisheries, beginning at about $100,000 of gratuity, and reaching last year about $220,000 of gratuity. This year it will be still larger; and in 1842, when the compromise has reduced the salt tax to an ad valorem of twenty per cent. the amount paid will be still increased, and nearly the whole will be a naked gratuity, and the salt tax not sufficient to pay it. The tax, on our average importations of about one million of dollars' worth, will be only $200,000; while the bounties and allowances, increasing as for some years past (and the temptation to increase becomes stronger every day) will be about $400,000. The spectacle will then be presented of an entire nation taxed in its salt for the sake of presenting the amount to few thousand fishermen, and the product of the tax not being sufficient, other taxes must make up the deficiency.

He said he had been raising his voice "solitary and alone" for years past, to wake up the Senate and the country to the errors of our legislation in relation to the three points to which he now called attention—the sugar drawback, the rum drawback, and the fishing bounties and allowances. He had been raising his voice solitarily to this effect: he had been standing almost alone up to the present time; but at last other voices had come to his assistance. The collector of the port at New York, (Mr. Hoyt,) pours into the Treasury Department a continued succession of letters to show the alarming amounts of the sugar drawbacks, and the rapidity of their increase; the Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Woodbury,) both in his annual report on the finances, and in a late recommendation for the issue of five or six millions of Treasury notes, has called the attention of Congress both to the sugar drawbacks and the fishing bounties and allowances; and has earnestly called for some legislative action to protect the Treasury from their heavy drains. The drains were indeed heavy, and might well make the Secretary begin to cry out. They were near a million of dollars last year, will probably be near two millions next year, and three the year after if not arrested. Two-thirds of what is now drawn, is unjustly and unconstitutionally drawn; as the duties increase this proportion increases, and will soon be three-fourths or four-fifths. Mr. BENTON then submitted his resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the drawbacks on refined sugar and rum, manufactured out of foreign materials, and exported, in proportion to the reduction which has taken place, and will take place, under existing laws, in the duties on imported sugar and molasses; also of reducing the fishing bounties and allowances in proportion to the reduction which has taken place, and shall take place, under existing laws, in the duty on imported salt.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

The following bills were considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to encourage the introduction, and promote the cultivation, of tropical plants," approved seventh July, 1839.

The bill to confirm the survey and location of claims for lands in the State of Mississippi, east of the Pearl river, and south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN to the motion to recommit the bill made by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. SOUTHWARD resumed and concluded the remarks commenced yesterday in opposition to Mr. CALHOUN's amendment, and in favor of that of Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then rose, and expressed his intention of submitting some remarks, but yielded to a general wish for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, January 16, 1841.

After the journal had been read,
Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Charles J. Ingersoll be paid the mileage and per diem of a member of Congress up to the time that the case of the contested election between himself and CHARLES NAYLOR, from the Third Congressional District of the State of Pennsylvania, was decided by the House.

Objection being made,

Mr. CAMPBELL moved a suspension of the rules, and thereupon called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut suggested to the gentleman from South Carolina the introduction of a clause providing for a deduction from the per diem allowance and mileage paid last session to Mr. Ingersoll for witnesses and taking testimony. If such a clause should be inserted, he, Mr. S. would vote for the resolution.

But the yeas and nays having been ordered, were then taken, and resulted—yeas 55, nays 85, as follows:

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. PROFFIT asked leave to introduce a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to what particular appropriations that officer is of opinion may be dispensed with during the present year.

Objection being made,

Mr. PROFFIT moved a suspension of the rules; which motion was negatived.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee of Elections, on leave, reported a resolution authorizing the payment to Mr. Carlisle, clerk of the committee, an extra compensation of $2 per day for the great labor he was compelled to perform at the last session.

On motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, the resolution was laid on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee of Claims, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bills entitled

An act for the relief of Charles M. Keller and Henry Stone; and

An act for the relief of Lieutenant John E. Cispham; which were severally read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. GIDDINGS, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of George Fisher, William B. Whitehead, James Pennoyer, S. B. Tuck, Dr. F. Weedan, Lavina York, George W. Walton, and William Clendening; which reports were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Dallam and Hamburg; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act to refund to Noah Miller and others a part of the proceeds of the sale of the British sloop Mary and cargo, which were captured by them, and libelled and sold for the benefit of the United States;" which bill was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. WINTHROP, from the same committee, reported

A bill for the relief of Thomas Eldridge;

A bill for the relief of the owners of the ship Lexington, of Nantucket; and which were severally read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A bill for the relief of the schooner Joseph, of Wareham;

Mr. HABERSHAM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to amend an act to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans, passed on the 9th day of February, 1837; which was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. H. also made an unfavorable report on the memorial of merchants and ship owners of Richmond and Petersburg, in the State of Virginia, in favor of a marine hospital at City Point; which report was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That ten thousand extra copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, together with the maps, be printed for the use of the House: Provided, The same plates can be used, upon which the same maps furnished the Senate have been printed, and without any additional expense for engraving.

Mr. CRARY, from the same committee, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," passed the 18th day of April, 1806.

After some remarks by Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, WISE, MONTGOMERY, and LEWIS WILLIAMS, the bill, with certain amendments, by general consent, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHN W. DAVIS, from the Select Committee appointed on the 31st December ultimo, to which was referred the letter from JOHN C. RIVES, one of the firm of BLAIR & RIVES, &c. made the following report:

The Select Committee to which was referred the letter of John C. Rives, one of the Printers to this House, dated the 31st ultimo, and the memorial of Hugh A. Garland, Clerk to this House, dated the 4th instant, both communications referring to a controversy between the parties as to the powers of the Clerk to control the binding of Congressional documents and the printing of the special orders of the House, have given to the subject that attention which it seemed to demand, and now ask leave to report:

In the first paragraph of Mr. Rives's letter, complaint is made that the Clerk had not sent all the printing ordered by the House to Blair and Rives, as Printers to this body. The Clerk, under some examples to be found in the practice of this body within the last few years, felt authorized to contract with others than the Printers elect to this House, for such items of printing as were ordered by the special act of this body. Under this practice the Clerk felt himself at liberty to give to Mr. Langtree the printing of an index to the reports and documents ordered to be prepared in the year 1837, but which was not ready for the press until the last season. It is to the printing of this document that Mr. Rives refers in the first part of his letter. The committee have examined, for both, the law and the precedents to justify this transfer of printing to others than the public Printers; and after proper investigation, are compelled to the conclusion that all the printing to be executed by the order of the House, of right belongs to the Printers elected by it; and that no special order of the House to the Clerk to have executed a particular item of printing, can in any manner vitiate the claim of the public Printer to execute such work. For example, if, by the contract between this House and the public Printers, the House has the right to demand the execution of such work of its Printers, they (the Printers) are in return entitled to receive it, if they desire it: and that such obligation does rest upon the Printers, is manifest from the fact that the condition of their bond (given for the faithful performance of their duty) expressly declares that "if they shall well and faithfully execute all the printing, &c."—which shows conclusively their obligation to perform all such service and also shows, in the estimation of the committee the right to receive all the printing ordered by this House. The committee, however, beg leave, to state, that as the printing of the index referred to, is in a state of forwardness at the office of Mr. Langtree, it should remain to be completed by him, according to the terms of the contract made by the Clerk with Mr. L. for the execution of that work. The committee have made this suggestion without compromising the principle which they have laid down, as to the claim of the public Printer to do all the printing, because the committee are not advised that ever that document has been ordered to be printed.

Upon the subject of binding the committee have searched in vain for any legal provision in relation to the matter. Until within the last twelve or fourteen years, little or no binding had been ordered by, or was executed for, Congress; and during that period it has always been executed either directly or indirectly by the Printers to the House, as appears both by testimony given to the committee, and the archives of the Clerk's office.

Your committee do not assume the position that binding constitutes any part of the business of a printer, or that it is even germane to that avocation; in fact, it is in evidence before us, that printing and binding are distinct and separate branches of business, and usual pursued as such. Notwithstanding, your committee are of opinion the practice which has obtained for the last twelve years should be adhered to, until Congressional legislation shall specifically assign this duty to some executive officer of the House, or provide for its execution in such mode or manner as may be thought most expedient. In order to show that the binding has been considered as a perquisite to the public printing, it is only necessary to refer to the reports made at the last session of Congress by a select committee, and the debate connected with them.

The following conclusions are submitted as the result of the deliberations of the committee:

First. That there is nothing in the character of the controversy, or the evidence submitted, to imply censure upon either of the parties, but seems to have been the result of a misapprehension of the legitimate sphere of their respective duties.

Second. That, by existing laws, all the printing ordered by the House should be executed by the public Printer.

Third. That, in accordance with the usage of the last twelve years, in the absence of any legal provisions, the binding of such documents as he may print should be executed by the public Printer as an incident to the printing.

The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Respectfully submitted.

JNO. W. DAVIS, Chairman.

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following communications, viz:

1. From the First Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the act of Congress, passed the 3d March, 1809, First. A statement of such officers as have not

2. From the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report in answer to a resolution of the House of the 16th of December ultimo, as to what subordinate custom-house officers have been dispensed with within the period of two years last past, and what had been the rate of compensation previously paid to such officers for their services, and also relative to the erection of custom-houses in New York and Boston.

3. From the First Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of balances on the books of the Register of the Treasury which have remained unsettled for three years prior to the 30th September, 1840, made in obedience to the act passed 3d March, 1817.

5. From the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with the ninth section of the act of 20th April, 1818, a statement showing the names of the clerks employed during the year 1840 in the offices of the Secretary of the Navy and the Navy Commissioners respectively, the time each clerk was actually employed, and the sum paid to each.

The above communications were severally laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The Senate bill entitled, "An act supplementary to the act entitled, 'An act for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and for other purposes,'" approved June 12, 1840, was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the private bills on the calendar.

After some time spent therein, the following bills now reported, with an amendment, striking out the enacting clause.

A bill for the relief of Nothaniel Goddard and others.

A bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Don Carlos de Villemont.

A bill for the relief of Jeremiah Smith.

Also, the following bills, without amendment:

A bill to incorporate the Washington City Benevolent Society.

A bill for the relief of Sarah H. B. Stith and children.

A bill for the relief of W. B. Winston.

A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Jones and others.

A bill for the relief of Thompson Hutchinson.

A bill for the relief of Esther Parrott.

Also, a bill for the relief of Job Halsey.

Without coming to any decision thereon,

The following bills, reported without amendment, were then taken up by the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

A bill for the relief of W. B. Winston.

A bill for the relief Elizabeth Jones and others.

A bill for the relief Thompson Hutchinson.

A bill for the relief of Esther Parrot.

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Don Carlos de Villemont was next taken up, and the amendment of the committee, striking out the enacting clause, concurred in.

The question then being on agreeing with the amendment of the committee, striking out the enacting clause of the bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard and others, the yeas and nays were ordered, when the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 18, 1841.

The PRESIDENT submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in reply to a resolution submitted some time since by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, in relation to the sales of the public lands, which have been for several designated periods of time liable to sale at public entry; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY subsequently moved that one thousand additional copies should be printed; which, after some remarks by Messrs. WALKER, KING, and CLAY of Kentucky, was agreed to.

AMERICAN WATER-ROTTED HEMP.

The PRESIDENT also submitted a report from the Secretary of the Navy in reply to a resolution submitted by Mr. BENTON, some days since, in relation to the use of American water-rotted hemp in the navy of the United States.

Mr. BENTON moved that the report be printed, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed his gratification that the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) had introduced this subject to the attention of the Senate and the country. He himself, a number of years ago, had procured some hemp to be water-rotted in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, the place of his residence, and to be sent to the navy yard in Philadelphia. After trial, it was found to be fully equal, if not superior, to the best Russian hemp. The process of water-rotting had, however, been abandoned, in that county, in consequence chiefly of an impression that it was unhealthy.

Mr. Myerle had written him several letters on this important subject. That gentleman, with a perseverance and energy which deserved all praise, had introduced extensively in Kentucky the process of water-rotting. He had conquered the prejudices which heretofore existed against it, and had, as he states, demonstrated that it was not unhealthy. This was a most expensive operation, in which he had risked his all; and he had thus rendered great service to his country. Why should we be dependent upon foreign nations for the article of water-rotted hemp, which is essential both to our navy, and to our merchant service? Mr. Myerle had demonstrated that our countrymen could supply this article in abundance. He had sent Mr. B. a specimen of his hemp, which had been submitted to those who were judges of the article, and had been pronounced equal to the best Russia hemp.

After Mr. Myerle had embarked his all in this business, it would be highly unjust to deprive him of the benefit of his exertions. The Navy Department, according to the existing laws, would be bound to grant the contract for American water-rotted hemp to the lowest bidder. It might thus happen, and Mr. Myerle was apprehensive it would happen, that some individual, taking advantage of the knowledge acquired by his toils and exertions, might underbid him a trifling amount, and thus impose upon him all the labor and expense of introducing the process of water-rotting hemp, whilst all the advantages would result to another. He thought it was no more than strict justice that the Department should be authorized to contract with Mr. Myerle for a reasonable quantity of hemp at a fair price, without advertising for other bidders.

He was glad that the Senator from Missouri had moved in this business, as it could not be under better auspices.

The motion to print and refer was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law which does not contain a provision including banks; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial from citizens of Perrysburg, Ohio, in favor of the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented a memorial of citizens of Connecticut, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorials of the branch pilots of New York and New Orleans, reported a bill to repeal an act concerning pilots, approved March 2, 1837; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Joint Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Langtree and O'Sullivan; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petitions of Caleb Eddy and George W. Jones, made unfavorable reports thereon. After some remarks from Mr. KNIGHT and Mr. KING, the report was laid on the table.

Mr. WHITE gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for satisfying outstanding claims to military bounty land warrants.

Mr. PIERCE gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill relating to judicial courts for the district of New Hampshire.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the memorial of numerous shipmasters and others in the port of New Orleans, praying a slight modification of the laws relating to pilots, passed March 2, 1837; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution submitted on Saturday last by Mr. TAPPAN to go into an election of Sergeant-at-Arms, was, on Mr. T's motion, laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury furnish the Senate with a statement, showing in tabular form the lands, the titles for which were closed under the relief laws of 31st March, 1830, and 25th February, 1831, giving the numbers of acres in each district which were sold at and under $5 per acre; from $5 to $10 per acre; from $10 to $15; from $15 to $20; from $20 to $30; from $30 to $40; from $40 to $50; from $50 to 60; from $60 to $70; from $70 to $80; from $80 to $90; from $90 to $100; and $100 and upwards per acre; the amounts paid on such sales respectively and forfeited; the rates at which such sales were closed per acre; also, the gross amount of lands patented under each of these two laws in each district; the amounts in gross for which they were originally sold, the gross amounts paid on them and forfeited; and the gross amounts finally received for them.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to encourage the introduction, and promote the cultivation, of tropical plants," approved seventh July, 1838; and

The bill to confirm the survey and location of claims for lands in the State of Mississippi, east of the Pearl river, and south of the thirty-first degrees of north latitude; were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief Gregoire Sarpy, or his legal representatives, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill making certain appropriations for the Patent Office was taken up, and after being explained by Mr. STURGEON,

Mr. CALHOUN moved to strike out an appropriation for collecting agricultural statistics, which he advocated at some length. The motion was opposed by Mr. STURGEON, Mr. WALKER, and Mr. PRENTISS; and, it being one o'clock, on motion by Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log-cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN to the motion to recommit the bill made by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama addressed the Senate at much length in favor of the original bill and the amendment of Mr. CALHOUN, and in opposition to the substitute proposed by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

On motion by Mr. WHITE, who intimated his intention of speaking on the subject, the bill was informally passed over; and

On motion by Mr. SEVIER,
The Senate went into Executive session.
And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 18, 1841.

Mr. CHINN, on leave, in pursuance of notice heretofore given, introduced two bills, viz:

A bill to revive an act entitled "An act to authorize the inhabitants of the State of Louisiana to enter the back lands;" and

A bill to unite the southeastern land district, and that of the district west of Pearl river, and east of the Island of New Orleans; and to form a new district thereof, and for other purposes; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The special order of the day being the consideration of the

TREASURY NOTE BILL,

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ADAMS in the chair,) and took up said bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the Government may require, but not exceeding the sum of five millions of dollars of this emission outstanding at any one time—to be reimbursed in the last quarter of the year, if the condition of the Treasury will permit it—and to be issued under the limitations and other provisions contained in the act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October, 1837, and as modified by an act entitled "An act additional to the act on the subject of Treasury notes," approved the 31st day of March, 1840, except that this law shall expire in one year from and after its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, said:

I propose, Mr. Chairman, very briefly, to assign to the committee the reasons which appear to me to render the passage of this bill necessary and proper; and if it shall appear that the means asked are really required to enable the Government punctually to meet its numerous pecuniary obligations, and to maintain, unbroken, its faith, it would appear to me, that no other reason need be assigned to entitle it to the favorable consideration of the committee. And, however we may differ among ourselves as to the mode in which relief should be furnished, it is, I am sure, an object which is very near the heart of every representative of the people, to save the Government of his own choice from the degradation into which it must necessarily sink, should that relief, which is really necessary, be withheld.

A careful examination of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the state of the finances, submitted to Congress at the commencement of its present session, must, I think, satisfy every one, that this measure is not rendered necessary, and consequently is not intended to provide for any permanent deficiency which is expected to exist in the revenue of the Government at the close of the year, for if he be right in his estimates of receipts for the year, and the appropriations be kept within the estimates submitted, the receipts for 1841 will be sufficient to discharge as well all ordinary expenditures, as those parts of the outstanding debt, funded or unfunded, which may become due. But it is intended so to use the credit of the Government as to anticipate, and that for a short time only, the revenue of the Government; for it must be obvious, that thrown, as the receipts and expenditures are, most unequally, upon different periods of the year, while the receipts for the whole year may be amply sufficient, they may not, and probably will not, be realized in time to meet the liabilities as they are expected to arise. It is not common that the Government realizes its heaviest receipts until the third quarter of the year; produced principally by the fall importations of woollens, on which cash duties are paid, which are immediately available.

The revenue for the first quarter of the year, exclusive of the balance in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1841, is estimated at $3,500,000. The liabilities of the Government during the same period are estimated at $5,430,000, as will more fully appear by reference to the following statement of receipts and expenditures for the first quarter of 1841.

A.
Estimates for the first quarter of 1841, ending March 31st.
1. RECEIPTS.
From duties, considering the large drawbacks and refunding under new judicial decisions, unless the law is speedily amended, not over	$3,000,000
From sales of lands, unless the banks resume specie payments immediately, not over	450,000
From miscellaneous sources, and from indebted banks, if further time is given to those in Natchez, and the United States Bank pays its balance, as expected, to a special object, and not for general purposes, about	50,000
	$3,500,000
2. EXPENDITURES.
Ordinary ones, including pensions, session of Congress, and usual number of private acts	$4,500,000
District debt to Holland, principal first instalment and interest	80,000
Fishing bounties, either out of the Treasury, or reserved from the accruing revenue	300,000
Most of the expenses for taking the census	550,000
	$5,430,000

So that if an available balance be kept in the Treasury, and the receipts for the first quarter of the year be realized, they will not be sufficient to meet the expenditures by one million nine hundred and thirty thousand dollars; and when you shall have applied the whole of the estimated balance in the Treasury on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-one, if it were all available, and could be so applied, there would still be a deficiency of three hundred and twenty-nine thousand one hundred and forty-five dollars. But it is not all available, and cannot, therefore, be so applied. I say it is not all available, because one hundred and eighty thousand dollars due from the bank at Natchez, and included in the estimated balance, has not, as was expected, been paid; and not more than five or six hundred thousand dollars of the balance is in the eastern portion of the Union, where it could be made available in time to meet the heavy demands which have been already adverted to, and where three-fourths of the expenditures are required. The balance is in the land offices to the West, in the mints, and other smaller depositories, some seventy or eighty in number, scattered over the whole country. I might also add that the construction given to the tariff laws by the courts of the United States, which almost daily cause heavy amounts of duties to be refunded, and the drawbacks on refined sugars, and other articles, have contributed in no small degree to lessen the receipts from duties on foreign importations. But as no legislation could correct the mischief in time to afford reasonable relief, the committee have reported this bill.

I have, Mr. Chairman, as I promised, very briefly presented to you a statement of the estimated liabilities of the Treasury for the first quarter of the year, with its means for meeting those liabilities, from which I think it must manifestly appear that temporary provision at any rate is required at the hands of Congress. I have also pointed the committee to some of the causes which produce that deficiency. I am aware, sir, that it may be argued, that this deficiency is not temporary merely, but permanent; and consequently that provision should be made not for a temporary, but for a permanent deficiency in the Treasury. If such an assumption be well founded, the conclusion I admit would follow. But is the position, that the deficiency is permanent, a sound one? And in deciding the question, we should look to the most authentic sources of information within our reach. Now, sir, to whom should Congress and the country look for information upon this important subject? Why, it would seem to me, to that officer whose station opens to him every avenue of information; and whose duty charges him with the general superintendence and management of the financial affairs of the country—the Secretary of the Treas-

ry. Hence it is, that he is required to submit estimates both of the revenue and expenditures of the Government. He has hitherto been looked to, and properly I think, to furnish Congress information upon all subjects relating to the finances. This duty he has performed at the commencement of the present session of Congress. I beg leave to refer to his annual report. (Document Number three, page seven)—he says:

"It may be stated, from the best data in possession of this Department, that the receipts, under the existing laws, will probably be as follows:

From customs,	$19,000,000
From lands,	3,500,000
From miscellaneous,	80,000
Add the expected balance in the Treasury available on the 1st January next,	1,580,855

The aggregate of ordinary means for the next year would then be, $24,160,855

There will be nothing more, either of principal or interest, due from banks, which is likely to be made available, except about 220,000

A power will exist, under the act of 31st March, 1840, to issue Treasury notes till a year from its passage expires, but not to make the whole emission outstanding at any one time exceed five millions of dollars.

This will furnish additional means, equal to the computed amount which can be issued at the close of the present year, being about 342,618

Hence, there may be added from these several sources so much as to make the whole means for the next year 24,723,473

On the other hand, the expenditures for 1841, for ordinary purposes, if Congress make no reduction in the appropriations requested by the different Departments, are estimated at 19,250,000

This would leave a balance in the Treasury at the close of the year equal to 5,473,473

But certain payments must also be made on account of the funded and unfunded debt, unless Congress authorize contracts to be formed for extending the time of their payment. Thus there will be required:

On account of the funded debt, chiefly for the cities of this District 149,200

For the redemption of Treasury notes, if all the others be issued, which can be under the present law, as then the amount returned within A. D. 1841, will probably not exceed 4,500,000

$4,649,200

Estimated balance in the Treasury at the close of the next year, after all payments whatever $824,273

I think, sir, that I must have succeeded in demonstrating, from data which is authentic, and the best within my reach:

1st. That the resources of the Government for the year are not only sufficient to meet its liabilities for the year, including the redemption of $4,500,000 of Treasury notes now outstanding, and the payment of that portion of the public debt, funded and unfunded, which will fall due; but that there will be a balance in the Treasury at the end of the year, of $824,273.

2d. That such are the inequalities between the receipts and expenditures as to render temporary relief necessary in the first quarter of the year; and it is to guard the Treasury against these inequalities and fluctuations between the receipts and expenditures, that the present measure has been introduced.

That some measure calculated to obviate the difficulties arising from these causes was to have been expected, appears to me almost too obvious to require comment. I will refer the committee to pages 2, 10, and 11 of the Secretary's report; and I do this as an act of justice to a faithful public officer. The Secretary says:

"Previous to the close of the year, should Congress pass any new appropriations which may be immediately expended, an additional charge to that extent will thus be imposed on 1840; and if amounting to any considerable sum, it might prudently be accompanied by some provision of new means sufficient for its payment."

Again he says:

"It will be observed, however, that though, under either of these arrangements, enough might be obtained, within the whole of 1841, for the objects contemplated, yet not a due or sufficient proportion in the first quarter; because by that time all the measures are not likely to go into full operation, nor much of the anticipated increase to happen in the actual receipts of duties under existing laws. Unusually heavy expenses will also fall on that quarter in the next year. In addition to a full portion of most of the current expenses, and the whole pension payments for the first half of the year, and one third of a million or more for all the annual fishing bounties, there will be imposed on it most of the charges for the whole year connected with the session of Congress and private bills, as well as large payments for taking the census, and for the first instalment of the debt of this District; several of them as early even as the first day of January.

"From these circumstances, and the considerations that all which is due from the banks may not be then paid, and that the balance in the Treasury, under the policy adopted by Congress of late years, will of necessity be small, while the fluctuations and inequalities are very great between the receipts and expenditures in different portions of the year, to which we are constantly exposed from causes that have on former occasions been explained at length, it must be obvious that entire safety requires a conditional power to be seasonably conferred on the Executive to obtain at any time within 1841 such subsidiary means as may be needed for a few months, and as may be sufficient to enable the Treasury punctually to discharge, during that year, all the liabilities imposed by Congress."

I am aware, sir, that we may be told the estimates are not to be relied upon; that those of the last year greatly exceeded the revenue of the year; but still they are mere estimates, based upon data which has hitherto furnished the rule that has governed the course both of the Secretary and of Congress; and from which I am not disposed to depart, unless I shall be satisfied that they are founded in error. And fortunate indeed will he be who will be enabled to make a tolerably near approach to exactness in these times of derangement in the monetary affairs of the country, when embarrassment seems to have spread almost over the whole land, and when revulsion succeeds revulsion in such rapid succession.

It is known to every gentleman, that the foreign commerce of the country constitutes the chief basis of the revenue of the General Government; and, with a knowledge of this fact, who can be at a loss for an explanation of the extraordinary diminution which has occurred in the revenue from customs during the last year? Who could have anticipated a falling off in the imports of more than fifty-seven millions of dollars?—the imports in 1839 (if I am right in my recollection) rising to more than $160,000,000, and sinking in 1840 to less than $105,000,000. We also know that the principal sources of our present revenue are sensibly affected by fluctuations, not only in commercial prosperity, but in the crops and in the banking policy and credit systems, both of our own country and of foreign nations; and the influence of these causes seems to become yearly more changeable and uncertain in its extent. Let those gentlemen who rely upon this ground of objection turn their attention to the year 1816—a time of profound peace—when there was a falling off in the regular receipts from duties from nine millions of dollars, in one quarter, to only three in the next; and in the sales of the public lands, from twenty-four millions of dollars, in 1836, or an amount over half of all received in the previous forty years, to less than three millions in 1838. In Michigan, alone, the sale of the public lands, in 1836, exceeded five millions of dollars. They fell in 1838 to $154,284; and in Mississippi, where, in 1835 and 1836, they exceeded three millions each year, they fell in 1838 to only $96,636. These extraordinary fluctuations result, in part, from the vacillating character of the sources from which our revenue is derived. But most of them are evils inseparable from the periodical contractions and expansions incident to the present defective system of banking, in a country so full of enterprise as ours, with such freedom in pursuits, such facilities of intercourse, and such strong temptations to rash speculation. I refer to these facts for the purpose of showing how difficult it is for any man, with even the best means of information before him, to arrive at any thing like exactness, under the circumstances in which the country is placed.

But, sir, I will not anticipate objections. If the estimates are to be regarded, it appears to me, that with a sufficiency of accruing revenue during the year to meet the current expenses of the year, there will certainly be a deficiency to meet them during the first quarter, and possibly for a longer period; certainly for a longer period, unless timely provision be made by Congress; and the question arises, as to what is the best mode of furnishing the relief required. I know, sir, that much diversity of opinion exists among the members of this House on this subject. I know that it has been so on all previous occasions, when similar measures have been introduced. The friends of the measure, regarding the deficiency in the Treasury as merely temporary, propose to anticipate for a short time only, the revenue of the Government, which cannot be received in time to meet its liabilities as they may arise. Gentlemen standing opposed to us, regarding the deficiency not as temporary, but permanent, will in all probability propose on this occasion, what has been before proposed in similar cases—to make permanent provision for it by contracting a loan; and thus, in all probability, lay the foundation for a permanent national debt. I need scarce say to you, sir, that I am opposed to a permanent national debt, unless demanded by circumstances of overruling necessity. Whether the deficiency now to be provided for, be temporary or permanent, must be judged of by us from the best information within our reach; that a deficiency exists has, I think, been clearly shown by the documents referred to; and that it is temporary merely, we have the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, whose report points us distinctly to the means deemed by him sufficient to meet all the charges upon the Treasury during the year; and in this view of the question we are called upon to determine whether it would be best to issue Treasury notes or negotiate a loan; the one mode will afford prompt and speedy relief, the other may not; one is certain, the other uncertain; the one is within our grasp, the other beyond our control.

But it has been shown, that in whatever form the relief asked for may be furnished, such is the condition of the Treasury as to require that it should be speedily provided; such are the pressing demands upon it at this time, and so large the amount to be provided by the 4th of March, when more than $1,000,000 for pensions will be payable, that if there was a certainty of procuring the amount by a loan, the delay to which the officer charged with the subject would be subjected in giving notice, advertising, receiving sealed proposals, and negotiating the loan, would, in all probability, postpone it to a period too remote to meet the exigency against which it is intended to guard. In the face of these difficulties, it does appear to me both wise and politic, to adopt the measure proposed, which has hitherto proved effectual to furnish in the most convenient form, and in the speediest possible manner, the contemplated relief.

But is it certain that a loan could be negotiated at all? To my mind it appears exceedingly doubtful. Now, sir, let it be borne in mind, that from the most authentic data, the deficiency to be provided for, is temporary merely, and not permanent: it is expected to be reimbursed at the close of the present year; and if this be so, there certainly can exist no sufficient reason why we should borrow for a longer period, since it would impose upon the Government the obligation of paying interest upon a debt, which its wants would not require. The question then recurs, could you be likely to negotiate a loan for so short a period? The capitalist, I presume, in making his investments of money, would look first to the security of the investment itself; and, secondly, to the time for which it is to continue—and hence that an investment in Government securities extending through a series of years, would perhaps be more desirable than any other; but the fact, that it would be redeemed within a year, would strip from it all its attractions, since the capitalist to whom the Government would look to take the loan, would, in all probability, have to sell out his stock in the funds, or draw in his money secured by trust deeds and mortgages: for I presume that no judicious capitalist would ever keep a very large amount of money locked up idle in his desk, when it could be judiciously invested. And what prudent man would be willing to change these securities for such a contingency as this? It were idle to expect it.

Again, can you certainly rely upon procuring the amount required, by a loan, upon reasonable terms, at a time when the people are in debt, the States of this Union in debt, and nations are in debt?

The next resort would be to the banks. Should we procure it from that quarter. Remember we may possibly want $5,000,000, and that in specie, or its equivalent, convertible paper, if there be any such thing. Why, sir, we know that the banks are now, as they have been for nearly three years, unable to redeem their own notes in specie.

And although the time is at hand, when by the enactments of the Legislatures of States, they are required to resume specie payments, the strong probability is, that they will either not resume, or if they do, that it will be followed very quickly by another suspension. At any rate it would, in the present crippled condition of the banks, be a very unsafe reliance.

But pass this bill and it operates directly to relieve the banks. It will furnish, in the form of Treasury notes, to the extent of the issue under it, a substitute for specie. These notes will soon find their way to our Atlantic cities, and be received at the custom-houses in payment of duties. They will also find their way to the West, and go into the land offices in payment for the public lands; and so far from operating injuriously to the banks, the effect will be to sustain and relieve them.

In the remarks which I have now submitted, I have endeavored to present the subject before the committee, in a financial view alone, apart from those exciting political topics so often introduced into the debates in this House.

The means provided by the bill now under consideration are considered amply sufficient to enable the Government to meet punctually all its liabilities during the year; and I have only farther to express the hope that those into whose hands the administration of the Government must shortly pass, may be enabled so to direct the ship of State as to preserve, in their purity, our Republican institutions, advance the prosperity of our common country, and promote the happiness of its citizens.

Mr. BARNARD then took the floor in opposition to the bill. He submitted the following amendment; but on a question arising as to its being in order, it was, for the present, withdrawn.

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill in relation to Treasury notes, and that the subject of making provision for the wants of the Treasury be referred back to the Committee of the Ways and Means with instructions—

1. To bring in a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow ten millions of dollars on the credit of the Government, and to issue bonds or scrip therefor.

2. To bring in a bill imposing additional revenue on wines, silks, linens, spices, and other articles, being luxuries, imported into the United States, but in such manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy, and spirit of the act of 2d March, 1833, commonly called the "compromise act."

Without concluding, Mr. B. gave way to a motion that the committee rise; which motion prevailed.

And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 19, 1841.

Mr. BAYARD appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury in compliance with a resolution of the Senate in relation to the land granted to the State of Indiana for the Wabash and Erie Canal; which was laid on the table.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The PRESIDENT also submitted the following report of the Secretary of the Treasury in part reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 16th inst:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

January 18, 1841.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report, in compliance with the first branch of a resolution, which passed the Senate on the 16th inst. in these words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate, the plan of a permanent change in the tariff, the details and general principles of which, he states in his annual report of the 7th ultimo, he has considered, and on which he is ready to report at any moment either House of Congress might express a wish to that effect."

Foreseeing in my annual report of December, 1839, that the subject of a revision of the present tariff might be safely postponed, I then stated, that it was not my intention to examine it at that time, being "a topic involving considerations of so difficult and agitating a character." But as some of the Committee on Manufactures afterwards expressed a wish for a plan of such a revision to be prepared by the session of 1840 and 1841, and as the large reduction which is to take place in the duties at the close of this year, and of June 1842, appeared in the view of many to render such a revision imperative, as a fiscal measure, before those times arrived, I deemed it a duty, for these and the reasons mentioned in my last annual report, to make the preparations expected, so that a system might be in readiness for the consideration of the committee or Congress, should it appear to them that the public interests required action on the subject at the present session.

A call being now made for it by the Senate, and supposing, from the language used, and the advanced period of the session, that an early reply is desired, I submit, without material alteration, the plan referred to, with its "details and general principles."

It is believed that the reduction in the duties on imports, which, by the existing tariff, will take place in the year 1842, cannot vary much from five millions of dollars. For reasons assigned in the last two annual reports on the finances, the expectations of the undersigned are, that if the expenditures are properly and seasonably diminished, it will not be necessary to raise all this amount by taxation in any form. But should Congress think differently, and conclude to obtain it by revising the present laws in relation to duties, it is believed that certain facts and principles are highly important for consideration, in deciding what kind of a revision is competent and most appropriate. In stating these facts and principles, with a view to explain the plan called for by the resolution, all possible brevity, consistent with the importance of the subject, will be employed.

The chief legislation, which now exists in force, bearing on this inquiry, is contained in an act passed March 21, 1833. That act is supposed to have been, not an ordinary measure of legislation, but the result of a compromise between certain great and conflicting interests on the difficulties then involved in the agitating matter of the tariff. Hence, though the act was in the form of a law, and therefore liable, in a proper case, to any future modification or repeal of its provisions, it is understood that the parties most concerned, contemplated thereby a permanent arrangement of the leading principles that should afterwards control the whole subject. The importance of the emergency which occasioned the passage of the law—the distinguished individuals who participated more immediately in adjusting its provisions, and the salutary influence of their operation up to the present time, in imparting a degree of stability to our manufacturing enterprise, sought in vain through the previous fluctuations of legislation, have probably contributed to strengthen this impression.

But however that fact may have been, and subject to subsequent alterations, as all laws must properly be considered, yet, to change the limitations in this one, so peculiarly situated, and to do it against the wishes of persons most interested, or without the apology of some public exigency or necessity of State, would surely seem to be unnecessary and, at least, of doubtful propriety.

Hence, at this period of peace abroad, of tranquillity at home, of great exemption from public debt, and of unquestionable ability to raise ample revenue without encroaching upon the plain import of the compromise, the undersigned cannot hesitate, while considering what would be the most appropriate revision of the tariff for the wants of 1842, to recommend one which shall not violate the stipulations contained in that compromise. What, then, are those stipulations or restrictions?

1. The first seems to be, that a reduction, by instalments, of the former rate of duties, when exceeding twenty per cent. should forthwith commence and continue uninterrupted until July 1st, 1842; so that when that period arrived, no duties whatever should exceed twenty per cent. The leading section of the act is explicit upon this point. Hence, to defer or repeal, as some have proposed, the two reductions now remaining, and which are to take effect in 1842, would keep many duties higher than twenty per cent. and thus be in direct violation of this general provision. But if these last reductions should create a deficiency in the revenue, the 6th section of the act would allow it to be supplied in a different way. Because this section provides, that in such an event, nothing contained in the law shall prevent "altering the rates of duty on articles, which, by the aforesaid acts of 14th July, 1832, are subject to a less duty than twenty per cent."

2. It will be seen, however, that this provision contains a second restriction, by limiting any revision made before 1842, for an increase of the tariff, to only such articles as pay less duty than twenty per cent.

3. The next and third restriction on a revision is, that though one may be made before 1842, for purposes of revenue, if, when increasing the duties, it be confined to articles paying less than twenty per cent. yet it should not raise the tariff on those above that rate, even for revenue, much less probably for any other purpose. The close of the 6th section seems to be express, that the duty on articles paying a less rate than twenty per cent. if changed before 1842, shall be altered "in such manner as not to exceed that rate."

What would be deemed the proper disposition of this limitation, if a duty of twenty per cent. on all imports would not yield sufficient for the legitimate purposes of revenue, must be settled when the case shall arise. But it is believed that, with proper economy, there is no likelihood of such a case ever occurring in a period of peace.

4. Another restriction, supposed to have been intended, is, that if a revision be made to operate after June 30th, 1842, instead of before, still, as a general rule, none of the duties shall be then raised above twenty per cent. Thus, the close of the 5th section provides that "all imports on which the 1st section of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to entry free from duty, or paying a less rate of duty than twenty per cent. ad valorem, before the said 30th of June, 1842, from and after that day, may be admitted to entry subject to such duty not exceeding twenty per cent. ad valorem as shall be provided by law." A change could then be made at pleasure from twenty per cent. downwards to entire freedom from any impost, but no increase was to be permitted to go above that rate.

Indeed, the inference would seem to be that the compromise was intended to prevent any duties from being assessed, even after 1842, exclusively for the purpose of distribution, or protection, whether below or above twenty per cent. in amount. Because a clause in the 3d section provides, that after 1842 "duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government," but is silent as to recognising or sanctioning an authority to do it for any other purpose. The raising such a revenue was the great object of granting any power in the Constitution to lay taxes and imposts. And it would be difficult to find, in a limited grant of powers, like what is contained in that instrument for laying imposts, a warrant to impose them for other and distinct objects, and especially, if the operation of such a measure, apparently under an assumed authority, and on a subject so delicate and momentous to mankind as taxation, should tend to enrich particular classes or sections, at the expense of others. In truth the tariff is as much a system of taxation as a land tax, a stamp tax, or a direct tax of any kind; and is chiefly distinguishable from them by being more subtle and less obnoxious in its form. The confining of all duties, hereafter, to a low rate, was, therefore, desirable to the great mass of the people, because it was confining taxes to a low rate. It was further supposed, without doubt, that though comparatively low, they would yield, with the other ordinary receipts, an ample supply of revenue for such an "economical administration" as is contemplated by this section of the act. It is also probable, that many sound principles of political economy and a mutual desire to arrange permanently the tariff controversy, united to persuade Congress, not only to reduce the duties lower, but to provide that they should always be kept lower. It must have been foreseen, that this would avoid the useless vacillation, if not folly, of first diminishing all the duties to twenty per cent. by 1842, with a view afterwards of again immediately raising them above it. It was obvious, too, that, by keeping the imposts more reduced, the tariff would operate more advantageously to free trade, and the procurement of reciprocal favors abroad. By confining, in substance, any future change to purposes of revenue alone, and within twenty per cent. instead of a wide range of thirty, fifty, eighty, and even more, at times, previously in practice, and frequently for protection, it would likewise impart greater permanency and prosperity even to manufacturing, and, with that, to all other descriptions of industry. It is well known, from recent experience, that such stability in our system of duties would be better for the manufacturer, as well as the merchant, and the community at large, than even a higher rate exposed to constant changes, because in the former case intelligence and foresight could make more accurate calculations for the future. A more uniform thrift, a more regular reward to industry, and a higher tone of moral feeling, would everywhere take the place of constant fluctuations, mere gambling speculations, and a dangerous overaction from renewed hopes of high profits—often so very fallacious. Business and the currency would then be steady, and be regulated, as they should be, rather by the great laws of trade, than by banks or politicians. Nor is this permanency injurious to the laborer and artisan any more than to others; as all trades and regions of this country are open to enterprise, and a larger share here, than abroad, of the income in any one branch of business must, and should, uniformly go to wages rather than capital, or the workman will, under our free institutions, quit it for more lucrative employment. On the contrary, if an unusually large share go to him, for a time, in any particular pursuit or place, others will soon rush in, participate, and reduce it by competition even below the average. Uniformity and steadiness are, therefore, not injurious to any, though engaged in labor or manufactures, but useful to all, except the mere speculating classes.

Two other restrictions exist in the 3d section of the compromise act, which seems to have been intended more especially for the benefit of the manufacturers and of the revenue.

5. One is, that, after June, 1842, "all duties on imports shall be collected in ready money, and all credits now allowed by law in the payment of duties, shall be, and are hereby, abolished." This was regarded at that time, as a change likely to be very favorable to the manufacturing class, by making the twenty per cent. in cash operate, virtually, as a higher protection than twenty per cent. on a credit as now, of three and six months, without interest. In point of fact it was, also, a provision, prophetic as to evils to come, under an excessive credit system, and will be possessed of much importance in curing them, and in securing the Government, and through it, the community at large, against losses by credit to merchants for duties, and by defaults of collectors, district attorneys, and marshals, caused by indulgence from them in collecting bonds for duties. After June, 1842, the importers of goods will, in this respect, stand on the same foundation with the purchasers of public lands. While no complaint can then be made by either, of favor or discrimination, the revenue will thus be rendered much safer, and public and private morality improved by the removal of one great source of speculation and bankruptcy.

6. The other restraint requires the duty, after 1842, to be imposed on the value of the merchandise "at the port where the same shall be entered." This will render the twenty per cent. still more important to both the manufacturers and the revenue, by being more secure against frauds and evasions, and being another virtual increase of duty on the same articles; as the latter are usually worth much more here than abroad. Whether the value of them here being not uniform at different ports, would, if taken as the guide in assessing the duty, be justly open to any constitutional objection, it is not deemed appropriate on this occasion to discuss. From these various considerations the following deductions are made:

That the present tariff laws should be as little disturbed by any revision as possible, consistent with the public wants, and an adherence to sound principles; that changes should be made chiefly, if not solely, for purposes of revenue; that these changes, when raising the duty, whether operating before or after July 1, 1842, should, as a general rule, be confined to articles not paying a duty as high as twenty per cent.; that except in extreme cases, it should never raise them above that rate; and, lastly, that the existing provisions for the payment of duties in cash, and the assessment of them on the value of the merchandise at the port of entry after 1842, are too important to be disregarded.

A principle deemed useful in carrying out these views, is this: In raising the sum needed, if it does not become necessary to subject all free articles to a duty, or to one as high as twenty per cent. and a discrimination can therefore be indulged within the restrictions of the compromise act, it is doubtless a sound axiom to select for highest taxation articles of luxury, rather than of necessity. Under similar circumstances it is, also, not only competent, but expedient, to select such of the former as compete most with similar articles of American growth or manufacture, though not to raise the duty on them above the limitation of twenty per cent. And another discrimination, sometimes useful, might be to select those articles, in certain cases, for an increased impost, not usually exceeding the same limitation, which may be proper for countervailing injurious imposts, placed on our own productions by any foreign power. The broad and well settled ground on which these distinctions rest, cannot require on this occasion much detailed illustration. For the luxuries of life are enjoyed by the few, rather than the many—the rich instead of the poor—and their use tends rather to effeminacy and pleasure, than to what invigorates or makes useful. In a form of Government like ours, these principles apply with peculiar force, as an excessive indulgence in luxuries always operate as a bane to republican manners, and, in time, to republican principles. On the contrary, articles of universal use, and considered as the necessities of life, are beneficial to all, and are to be cheapened as much as possible to promote the comforts of all. So what is American, may well be supposed entitled to receive, within the limitations stipulated, more incidental favor than what is foreign, because obtained with more readiness and certainty as well as being more safe and independent in its use. Nor can any other country complain with justice, if we counteract its high taxation on any of our products, by imposing some corresponding impost on theirs; and however unprofitable such conflicts usually prove to all concerned, yet when such a measure becomes convenient for our own fiscal purposes, or is required by proper self respect, and is kept within due restrictions as to the amount of duty, it is believed to be entirely justifiable. The present tariff is, in many of these respects, an anomaly. Being designed to get rid of revenue when it was too abundant, and to diminish a supposed protection to manufactures, deemed unreasonably high, as well as to establish certain general rules for keeping all duties lower in future, it sometimes omitted to make useful discriminations, and, as a system, does not sufficiently discountenance luxuries or favor the necessities of life. Indeed, the former have already become free in many cases, and in others will be taxed lightly, under the reduction now in progress; while the latter, though at the expense of the consumer, however poor, will in almost every instance, bear as high, if not higher burden, than the greatest superfluity. In proposing a plan to raise the sum desired, one cardinal object is, therefore, to obtain the money in a manner that shall not prolong any improprieties or incongruities in principle: and another is, to do it, and still preserve faithfully the limitations and stipulations of the compromise as before explained. To furnish some data for practical legislation, which may accomplish these designs harmoniously, two tabular statements have been prepared, which will next be briefly explained.

The first one gives the names and value of all free articles imported into the United States in A. D. 1838, after deducting such of them as were exported. (See A.) Taking the imports of that year as a guide, and perhaps nearer an average, for some time to come, than any other, though probably too low, and the value of all the free articles, (excluding, of course, specie, and the amount of others re-exported,) would be about $38,161,583. A duty on these, indiscriminately, of fifteen per cent. would yield a net revenue not far from the five millions that may be needed in 1842. But this would embrace several articles which, under the principles before suggested, might judiciously be left free, or at a lower rate of duty than fifteen per cent. Another mode of raising the same amount of revenue, would, therefore, be preferable, if it could be accomplished without including those articles. Suppose, then, that there should be selected from the free articles those which may be regarded most as luxuries, though not, in every respect, belonging exclusively to that class. Such are teas, coffee, and silks. Should we then add to them others, conflicting with similar American productions, such as worsteds, laces, &c. and the aggregate, deducting the amount re-exported, would be $29,026,448. (See the second table, B.) A duty of twenty per cent. on those, after paying the expenses of collection, would yield about the same amount of five millions. This seems to contain the general data for the most eligible and unexceptionable revision. If a less sum than five millions should prove to be needed, as it is presumed will be the case under the diminished expenditures and increased importations, anticipated and explained in the recent annual report on the finances, as well as from the further augmentation of revenue likely to happen from the new mode of assessing the value of merchandise, any suitable modifications can be made in these details, without departing from the principles believed to be the most appropriate to govern the subject.

So some articles of luxury not now free, but paying a less duty than fifteen or twenty per cent. might very properly be taxed to that extent; and some necessities of life so situated, might be made free or be taxed lower, instead of them. Among the former may be mentioned wines, though when any of them cannot at present be made to pay an additional duty without violating some treaty stipulation, they should, of course, be exempted during the period agreed upon. Where any articles appear, also, to require an increased impost merely as a countervailing measure, such an one could be imposed without materially changing the general result as to revenue, if the increase was not made otherwise exceptionable, by exceeding the limitations in the compromise. Nor will difficulty probably exist, in any event, in permitting what is so very desirable, that some of the articles of necessity, which, by the present laws, will, after 1842, still pay a duty of 20 per cent. should be then exempted from all, or a part of it. But whatever plan may, in the end, be approved, it is apprehended that enough has been stated to explain the details of the one now offered, as well as the limitations and principles which ought, in the opinion of the undersigned, to govern all legislation on the subject. Nothing further will, therefore, be added as to any measure to be adopted for relief in 1842, except that half the amount of increased duty should be made to accrue only from the 1st of January in that year, and the residue commence the 1st of July after, as those are the periods when the great future reductions begin, which the new duties are intended to supply.

In connection with a permanent revision of the tariff, if made in the manner here recommended, it would be proper, under a plan of cash duties for all imports, to enlarge the liberty now enjoyed for depositing goods for a time in public stores. Indeed, the warehousing system, which exists in some other countries, might, in that event, be usefully revised, and so far as the new circumstances required, be adopted here.

As the higher class of duties, which exist under the present laws, will be reduced in 1842, so as virtually not to exceed an impost of twenty per cent. on the value of the merchandise imported, it might also be expedient to provide for the assessment of the whole of them afterwards on the ad valorem principle. At the same time, if not done previously, some of the large drawbacks and bounties, now allowed, could be regulated with more justice, and with much benefit to the revenue, by reducing them so as to correspond in their proportions with the reduced duties.

Some other particulars might be suggested in connection with a general and permanent revision of the tariff. But they are not of such a character as to occur readily to all familiar with the subject, and after the length to which this report has already extended, it is not deemed necessary to prolong it further, by an enumeration and explanation of them.

The other branch of the resolution in respect to the new mode of valuing the imports will be answered at the earliest day practicable.

Respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. R. M. JOHNSON,
President of the Senate of the United States.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN to the motion to recommit the bill made by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. WHITE addressed the Senate at great length in opposition to the amendment of Mr. CALHOUN and in favor of that of Mr. CRITTENDEN.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN (proposing a cession of the public lands to the States in which they lie on certain conditions) and decided in the negative—ayes 18, nays 22, as follows:

The question was then taken on the proposition of Mr. CRITTENDEN, (to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States,) and decided in the negative—ayes 17, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merriek, Phelps, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, and White—17.

Several Senators then called for the question on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading; when

Mr. HUNTINGTON rose and said he had several amendments to offer, which, if it was the wish of the Senate, he was prepared to submit and have a vote taken on them, and he would promise not to detain the Senate long by his remarks in favor of them.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the friends of the bill were willing and anxious to take the vote to day. The subject had been before the Senate since the commencement of the session, and had been discussed to the almost entire exclusion of all other business. He thought further procrastination of the debate could lead to no useful results, and hoped the question would be disposed of this evening.

Mr. MERRICK moved an adjournment, which was carried, ayes 21, nays 19.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1841.

After the journal had been read, the following were severally a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, viz:
SENATE BILLS

The bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to encourage the introduction, and promote the cultivation, of tropical plants," approved 7th July, 1838; and

The bill to confirm the survey and location of claims for lands in the State of Mississippi, east of the Pearl river, and south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude.

Mr. FRANCIS MALLORY, on leave, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with a comparative view of the average cost of the army proper for each individual, taking the aggregate of the officers, professors of the military academy, cadets, and enlisted men in the service of the United States for the years 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, for subsistence to soldiers, clothing, quartermasters' and medical stores, and other articles embraced under the general character of supplies for the army not fixed by law; adopting as the plan of his report a communication to the House of Representatives from the Secretary of War, of March 5, 1832.

Mr. REYNOLDS offered the following resolution; which was read for information:

Resolved, That from and after next Saturday, the House of Representatives will meet at 11 o'clock of each day to the end of the session.

Objection being made,

Mr. REYNOLDS said he would try a vote upon it, and for that purpose moved to suspend the rule.

Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. WATTERSON asked leave to submit a resolution having reference to the subject of pension agencies.

But leave was not granted.

[Mr. WELLER presented the petition of George Watt and 149 other citizens of Preble county, Ohio, praying an appropriation to the national road; which, on motion, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.]

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The SPEAKER then announced the first business in order to be the consideration of the bill authorizing a further issue of Treasury notes; and the House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the bill,

The SPEAKER requested Mr. ADAMS to take the chair; but

Mr. ADAMS asked to be excused, as he had some important business to transact in the course of the day.

Mr. DAWSON was then requested to take the chair; but he was likewise excused, in consequence of a great press of private correspondence.

Mr. BANKS was then named, but also asked to be excused, as he must necessarily be absent for a portion of the day, for the purpose of attending to some business in which many of his constituents were deeply interested.

Mr. CASEY then took the chair; and the committee resumed the further consideration of the bill before the House.

Mr. BARNARD, being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks in opposition to the bill. In the course of his speech, he contended that the present Administration was bound to furnish all the means necessary to meet the outstanding liabilities of the Government. In his opinion, the sum asked for in the present bill would not be near sufficient. He objected to the issue of Treasury notes as unconstitutional, and was in favor of a direct loan. He also contended that in case the present Administration failed to make the ample provision which he deemed necessary, then the whole responsibility of calling an extra session of Congress would devolve upon it. Mr. B. concluded by moving to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, observing that if the motion should prevail, and be reported to the House, he would then immediately move the adoption of the resolution which he sent to the CHAIR on yesterday.

Mr. EVANS then took the floor on the same side, at concluded at half past three o'clock.

Mr. BELL followed, but gave way to a motion that the committee rise; which motion prevailed.

So the committee rose, and reported progress; and, on motion of Mr. LINCOLN, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House, whether the patents for lands, which have issued from the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, since the passing of the act of the 25th April, 1812, entitled "an act for the establishment of a General Land Office, in the Department of the Treasury," have in all cases, in satisfaction of military land warrants, or otherwise, been issued, in conformity with the requisitions in the eighth section of said act, "in the name of the United States," and been countersigned by the Commissioner of said office; and if these requirements have been omitted or departed from—in what particular, at what time, and under what authority the omission or variance has been authorized: and that he transmit, with his answer thereto, an exemplified copy of the form of patents which are now issued from said office, with the manner of their authentication.

At the request of Mr. CLIFFORD, the report from the Select Committee—to which was referred the letter of John C. Rives, one of the Printers to this House, dated the 31st ultimo, and the memorial of Hugh A. Garland, Clerk of the House, dated the 4th instant, both communications referring to a controversy between the parties as to the powers of the Clerk to control the binding of Congressional documents and the printing of the special orders of the House—was recommitted to that committee, for the purpose of making a verbal correction.

Several petitions were presented by Messrs. ATHERTON and HOFFMAN.

Mr. STANLY submitted the following as an amendment to the Treasury note bill; which was ordered to be printed.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the day of on the importation of articles hereafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties, that is to say:

On all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

On all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, ten per cent. ad valorem.

On all wines, except the wines of France, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

On all wines of France, as soon as the treaty with France will allow, a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem.

On all bleached and unbleached linens, table linen, linen napkins, and linen cambrics, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

The foregoing duties being in accordance with the terms and the spirit of the act of March 2d, 1833.

And be it further enacted, That all laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1841.

The PRESIDENT submitted a message from the President of the United States, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 20th July last; which was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT also submitted a report from the Secretary of War, with a statement of the contracts entered into by that Department during the year 1840; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of a number of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law during the present session; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON presented two memorials numerously signed by mechanics, merchants, and others of New York, praying that if any bankrupt law shall be passed by Congress, that banks, and other money corporations, may be included; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of the watchmen and assistant watchmen of the Executive Departments, praying extra compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the memorial of Solomon Andrews, asking that his padlock may be substituted for those now in the public use, reported that, as the Postmaster General had ample powers over this subject, they asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the invention; which was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the memorial of Stokes and Purdon, made an adverse report thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill in relation to the judicial courts of the district of New Hampshire, reported the same without amendment, and said he was instructed to ask that the bill should be taken up at the present time.

On Mr. SMITH'S motion the bill was then taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the memorial on the subject, reported a bill for the relief of John McNiel; was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON, the bill for the relief of the heirs of Agnes Dun-das, was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with any of the sureties on bonds given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York, was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the bill for the relief of the heirs of Francis Newman, was taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by WALKER, the bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the two per cent. fund accruing by the act for the admission of said State into the Union, was taken up as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill from the House, making temporary provision for lunatics in the District of Columbia, was taken up.

Messrs. WRIGHT, SMITH of Connecticut, HENDERSON, and CALHOUN opposed its passage on the ground of the want of power under the Constitution to appropriate moneys from the Federal Treasury for local purposes. It was advocated by Messrs. TAPPAN, MERRICK, KING, LUMPKIN, and WALKER, who denied that there was any constitutional question involved, and averred that justice and humanity loudly called for its passage. The question being taken on its passage, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 41, noes 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, Ker, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Mangum, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, and Young—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Henderson, Hubbard, Smith of Connecticut, Surgeon, and Wright—6.

The bill to make certain appropriations for the Patent Office;

The bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause surveys of the lakes and lake coasts to be made;

The bill for the relief of Avcry, Saltmarsh and Company;

The bill regulating commercial intercourse between the port of Cayenne, in French Guiana, and for the remission of certain duties; and

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the duties collected on the French ship Alexandre, were severally read a third time and passed.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up.

Mr. HUNTINGTON submitted several amendments, which will be more particularly designated when the debate to which they gave rise will be published, some of which were in substance as follows:

Strike out the word "eighteen," and insert "twenty-one," so as to confine the provisions of the bill to persons, heads of families, of twenty-one of age and upwards.

Upon this question the ayes and noes were demanded, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Webster, White, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholson, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Surgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Wright, and Young—24.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The result of the vote is ayes 24, noes 24: my vote is No: so the amendment is lost.

Mr. HUNTINGTON then moved to amend the bill so as to limit its operation to two years.

Mr. MERRICK moved an adjournment.

The ayes and noes on adjournment being demanded, it was determined in the negative—ayes 23, noes 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Hubbard, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, Mangum, Mouton, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan; Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—24.

The question then recurring on Mr. HUNTINGTON'S motion, it was decided in the negative—ayes 18 noes 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, and Tallmadge—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

Upon Mr. TALLMADGE'S suggestion, and by general consent, the word "white" was stricken out of the bill, as free persons of color were allowed to hold property in all the States of the Union.

The amendments of the committee of the whole being concurred in by the Senate,

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he wished now to renew the proposition, which was voted down in committee—to recommit the bill with instructions to report a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama and Mr. BENTON suggested that the motion to recommit would be perfectly in order after the bill was engrossed, and hoped the Senator from Kentucky would take that course, and permit them to have the vote upon engrossment this evening.

Mr. HUNTINGTON moved an adjournment, and a division being called for, it was negatived—ayes 21, noes 23.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 30, noes 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, and Southard—17.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1841.

Mr. EVANS presented a petition of the officers and members of the American Peace Society, praying Congress to take measures for convening a Congress of Nations for the purpose of settling the principles of international law, and of organizing a Court of Nations to examine and decide upon all disputes that may arise between two or more contending nations, and thus settle international quarrels without resort to war; which petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. E. also presented a petition of inhabitants of the town of Bucksport, in the State of Maine, praying for reform in the administration of the Government.

Mr. JONES of New York presented a petition of a portion of the inhabitants of Orange county, New York, and of Sussex county, New Jersey, for a post route from Unionville, New York, along the "Clove road," to Deckertown, New Jersey, and from the latter place along the "Drowned Land road," back to Unionville. Also, a petition of inhabitants of Wantage, New Jersey, for a post route from Unionville, New York, to Deckertown, New Jersey, on the "Clove road" route; which petition was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PECK asked leave to introduce a resolution, which was read for information, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House, the number of treaties and amended treaties held and concluded with, or proposed to, the New York Indians, or any portion of them, since the 1st day of January, 1834, and to which the United States were a party, and the place where such treaties and amended treaties were negotiated and concluded, respectively, and when, and the name of the person or persons representing the United States therein: And also, the names of all other persons (if any) who now are, or at any have been a party to, or interested in said treaties or amended treaties, or any of them; together with a detailed account of all expenditures, whether in money or otherwise, connected therewith; specifying particularly the several items of such expenditures, and by whom, and to whom, and when the same were made, and on what account, respectively: And whether the Ogden Land Company, or any member or agent of said company, have defrayed, or at any time, did agree to defray any portion of such expenditure; and if so, what portion, and when, and to whom. And that the Secretary of War also communicate to this House copies of all contracts or agreements between the United States and said land company, or any member thereof, and in any manner connected with, or relating to, said treaties, or amended treaties, or any portion of any of them. And that he also communicate to this House copies of all correspondence between the said Secretary or any other officer or agent of the United States and the said land company, or any member, attorney, or agent thereof, in relation to said treaties or amended treaties, or any of them, or in relation to the aforesaid expenditures, or any portion of them.

Objection being made to the introduction of the resolution,

Mr. PECK moved a suspension of the rules; but the motion was negatived.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. BELL being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks. He did not exactly agree with the views expressed on yesterday by his friends from New York and Maine [Messrs. EVANS and BARNARD.] For while on the one hand he condemned a spirit of mean parsimony in the Government, he would with equal care avoid a system of extravagance. There was a proper medium between the two, which was a just system of economy. After adverting to the efforts of the present Administration to restrict within certain bounds the expenditures, he contended that this was like a death bed repentance, and did not accord with its previous course.

Mr. B. said the true state of the question was not so much the present deficiency in the Treasury, but what provision ought to be made to meet the deficiency which would arise in 1842. In that year it was clearly foreseen that there would arise a permanent deficiency in the revenue, and in his opinion it was their duty to discuss that important question now. If the friends of the Administration should, however, neglect to provide for such an emergency, upon them must rest the responsibility of an extra session. He did not care so much about the form in which the present deficiency should be supplied. As the issue of Treasury notes had been fixed upon by the friends of the Administration, he had no objection to vote for it; but if any of his friends should move to amend by substituting a loan, he would rather support the measure. He was, however, perfectly willing to acquiesce in any mode which should be supported by the majority.

Mr. B. said, this was the first time for forty years that a new Administration, about to come into power, had to be restricted in their measures for the ensuing three quarters of the year, by the acts of the Administration going out of power. He then proceeded to contend that the expenditures of Government ought never to be reduced by the omission to carry into effect the appropriations made by Congress. After appropriations had been made, he urged that there was a moral obligation devolving upon the Administration to carry them into effect. Mr. B. then stated his opinion, that if all the appropriations authorized by Congress should be applied during the present year, the deficiency, instead of being but five millions, would amount to ten or perhaps twelve millions. He argued that if the expenditures were to be cut down, so as to bring them within the limit stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, then the army, navy, and other public interests, must necessarily suffer.

After some further remarks, Mr. B. contended that for the last two years the Administration had proceeded upon the "staving off" system, both as regarded the appropriations and expenditures; whereas, previous to 1838, the "go ahead" system was pursued.

Mr. B. then proceeded to examine and criticize in detail the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to argue that a large portion of the balances referred to were due to the former unexpended appropriations.

At this stage an incidental discussion arose between Mr. B. and Messrs. EVANS and WISE, as to the true meaning of the Secretary in his remarks relating to the unexpended appropriations, &c. It appeared that each gentleman had taken different views of the subject. Having, however, come to an understanding,

Mr. B. proceeded, and endeavored to show that the actual demands against the Government in the year would far exceed that estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury. He then reviewed the means proposed by the Secretary for meeting the demands, and argued that a good part of them consisted in the mere speculations of that officer, and he believed not more than one half would be good for cash.

He contended that even the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means himself did not rely upon the means referred to by the Secretary; for the introduction of the present bill proved that, notwithstanding the alleged means, good care was taken to get five millions of Treasury notes for the present quarter.

Mr. B. then proceeded, at some length, to consider the merits of the various measures suggested by the Secretary for meeting the deficiency which would arise in 1842. While on this head, he complained that the Whigs were the subjects of inconsistent charges from their opponents. For while at one time they were charged with being the tools of Britain, and acting under British influence, in the next breath they were accused of raising a high tariff as a commercial retaliatory measure upon the same country.

Mr. B. also adverted to various other topics; and having concluded at a few minutes past three,

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON took the floor, but gave way to a motion that the committee rise, which motion prevailed.

So the committee rose and reported progress.

Petitions, on leave, were presented by Messrs. DELLET, WARREN, RARIDEN, BELL, WILLIAMS of Connecticut, TRUMBULL, DOE, and REYNOLDS.

[Mr. REYNOLDS presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, praying for a remission of the duty on railroad iron purchased for the State of Illinois.]

Several other gentlemen asked leave to present petitions; but

Mr. ADAMS would object, unless petitions were called for by States.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN,
The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, January 21, 1841.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of Elizabeth Colburn; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PORTER presented the memorial of citizens of Washtenaw county, Michigan, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was ordered to be laid upon the table.

On motion by Mr. STURGEON, the petition and papers of Hannah M. Baldwin, now on file, were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MANGUM presented the memorial of Lot Stricklin; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the memorial of Thomas Owen, praying that the duties on certain goods destroyed by fire may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Captain J.

Throckmorton; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Samuel Mackey, reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. S. the bill was then considered as in committee of the whole, and after being explained and advocated by him, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to extend the charter of the Bank of Alexandria.

On motion of Mr. M. the bill was then taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Enoch Hidden, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Robert P. Wainwright, made an adverse report thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Robert Arheart, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the House to authorize the enrolment and registering of the schooner Amistad, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. K. from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to abolish the port of delivery, and the office of surveyor of the customs at Currituck Inlet, North Carolina, reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. K. the bill was then considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Howland Dyer, made an adverse report thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the two per cent fund according to the act for the admission of said State into the Union;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Agnes Dundas;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Francis Newman;

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with any of the sureties on bonds given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York; were severally read a third time and passed.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log-cabin thereon, was taken up, and having been read through, the question being on its passage—

Mr. CRITTENDEN then submitted the proposition which was negatived when the bill was as in committee of the whole—to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. C. said he wished to have a full vote of the Senate on this proposition, and, as there were some Senators now absent who would be here in a few days, he would move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Monday.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he was very reluctant to refuse any proposition in the nature of an appeal to postpone, if he thought that any change in the result would be produced by it. But if the absent Senators from Virginia and Massachusetts were both here, in his opinion, no change would be produced by their votes. The Senator from Massachusetts might indeed vote for the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky; but the Senator elected from Virginia has again and again voted against the proposition heretofore, and he believed on constitutional grounds. The friends of the pre-emption bill were anxious for its passage, as a measure of good to the new States, and beneficial to the whole Republic; and in his opinion, a further postponement of the bill would endanger its passage, from a want of time to consider it in the other House. For himself, therefore, he was opposed to, and would vote against, any further postponement of the bill.

After some further remarks from Mr. CRITTENDEN,

Mr. BENTON said the friends of the pre-emption bill had ever been desirous to keep it separate from the other propositions, that they might all have a separate consideration on their respective merits; but gentlemen opposite were endeavoring to load it down with matter that was foreign to it, and that would have the effect of overshadowing it. The bill had already been delayed in its passage about one entire month by those propositions to cede the public lands on the one side, and to divide our land revenue on the other; and a new debate had sprung up and then another, to overshadow the pre-emption bill entirely. Now he held it to be unparliamentary to bring on important propositions of this kind, to override a measure that was under discussion; and he held that each of these propositions should be made to rest on its own merits. All fair legislation would require this; and he denounced such a practice as had here been resorted to, as unparliamentary; and he held it to be much more so to push aside the present bill, or to delay it by such propositions, for the purpose of getting up a new measure, or to delay it for the purpose of getting new members to vote upon it. Suppose he were to ask gentlemen to wait on any particular measure until Senators, who might be detained by sickness, either of themselves or in their families, should arrive, would he be deemed by them to be in order, or would such a course be considered parliamentary? The whole would at once be declared to be unparliamentary. But what was the history of these measures relating to the public land? The first bill ever brought into the Senate on the subject was fourteen years ago. That bill contained the three principles (which were stated as well in the title as in the body of the bill) of graduation of the price, the right of pre-emption, and the cession of the remainder, after a certain period, to the States in which it lay. He (Mr. BENTON) brought in the bill himself, and the three principles—graduation, pre-emption, and cession, were all there; but what was the result? Why on a consultation among the friends of the bill, it was deemed more wise to separate the question of cession from those of graduation and pre-emption, and to allow that question to be brought in as a separate measure, and not to overshadow a small proposition with one of greater magnitude, and therefore they cast it off. But they afterwards found that they could get along with pre-emption much better when it was not connected with graduation, and they therefore made another separation. And what had been the result? Why, since they had made these divisions of the original measure, which he (Mr. BENTON) brought in in the year 1826, they had passed three or four pre-emption laws, not one of which would have passed if the propositions had all been kept together. The whole three questions which were brought in to close and wind up the whole land system between the Federal Government and the States, it was deemed at that early period essential to separate, and on that principle the friends of this bill were acting now, and already there were two propositions before the Senate—the one for pre-emption and the other for graduation, and gentlemen attempted to force on the former, which was then under consideration, a proposition of a totally different character. By the vote of last night, they saw there were two to one in its favor, and yet they were not satisfied with having delayed it a month on its passage, but they sought to lay it over still further, and for what? For the purpose of waiting until other Senators could come, whose votes in opposition would not change the result. On what then was their proposition for delay based? Could not the gentlemen go on with their distribution bill as a separate measure? Was it not absurd to suppose that the Kentucky bill to divide the land revenue could not get along unless they detained the pre-emption bill? When the friends of the bill saw such absurdities, it became them to speak out like men.

They had heard much said there against pre-emption and graduation—these two measures had been presented to the Senate and to the country as the most odious and intolerable of all schemes; epithets had been applied to them, and arguments brought to oppose them, as the most odious enormities; he asked then to be permitted to show that these "enormities" had not been thought unfit for the legislative action of that Senate on previous occasions, and that they had not always been deemed so opprobrious. He then read to the Senate a proposition which had been made four years since by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, which contained the principles of graduation and pre-emption—graduation as low as fifty cents per acre, and pre-emption to 150 acres—and was that bill the "total destruction of our beautiful land system?" Was that bill odious and abominable? And was the country called upon to revolt against that bill? Where was the difference between that bill and the bill then before them? And yet the proposition which was now denounced as leading to the "total destruction of our beautiful land system," as going to debauch the population of the States, was once deemed wholesome legislation. Let the gentlemen opposite bring their proposition forward as an independent one, and not attempt by it to overlay one of less importance. He had voted for the second proposition to amend, by striking out the instructions of the gentleman from Kentucky, and inserting the bill reported by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] but he had done so for the purpose of using that measure as a hammer to knock the other one in the head, and with no idea of overlaying the pre-emption bill with either of them. He was willing to defeat the distribution with the cession bill, and then he should have been ready to lay aside that also; but he was not willing to have the pre-emption bill laid aside. He hoped they should have the ayes and noes on the question of postponement. He was desirous to bring this matter to a close, but he was satisfied that, to use a remark of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] last night, no pre-emption bill could be passed but by candlelight, and he therefore notified the messengers to have the lamps in preparation.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone, and decided in the negative—ayes 18, noes 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, and White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

The question then recurring on the motion to recommit, Mr. CRITTENDEN addressed the Senate at much length, reviewing in detail the measures of the present Administration.

Mr. WRIGHT followed in reply, and was succeeded in the debate by Mr. WEBSTER, who was followed by Mr. BENTON, and at 5 o'clock

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, January 21, 1841.

On motion of Mr. CARR, the rules were suspended for one hour, for the purpose of calling for petitions by States.

Petitions were then presented by Mr. BURKE, of New Hampshire.

[Mr. BURKE presented the memorial of Alden Partridge, President of the University at Norwich, Vermont, in relation to the Military Academy at West Point, and praying that young men educated at other military institutions, be admitted on equal terms with the young men educated at West Point. Also, the memorial of Alden Partridge, praying Congress to take measures with a view to the establishment of a general system of education for the youth of the Republic.]

Messrs. BRIGGS, PARMENTER, LINCOLN, WILLIAMS, CALHOUN, and ADAMS, of Massachusetts.

Mr. ADAMS presented and moved the reference of a petition, asking the abolition of slavery in this District, and in the Territories; also, that no new Territory, tolerating slavery, may be admitted into the Union.

Mr. CONNOR moved to lay that portion of the petition which came under the standing rule on the table.

Mr. ADAMS asked how that was to be done, for the petition must then necessarily be cut in two.

Mr. WARREN observed that, if the petitioners thought proper to attach objectionable matter, not receivable by the House, to their petition, they ought not to complain if the whole was rejected. He was therefore in favor of the rejection of the whole.

That portion of the petition coming under the rule, having been laid on the table sub silentio,

Mr. BLACK moved to reconsider the vote, for the purpose, in case it should be reconsidered, of moving the rejection of the whole, as he contended that no part of it ought to have been received.

On that motion, Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. WISE rose to a point of order. He desired to know whether any portion of that petition could be received under the rule. The latter portion, relating to the admission of new Territories into the Union which tolerated slavery, was, in his opinion, as much within the spirit of the rule as the former portion of the petition; and he, (Mr. W.) had his attention been called to it at the time, would have combated the decision of the Speaker, by which the latter portion was received. His point of order was, that as the whole of the petition came under the rule, a motion to lay on the table a part of it could not be entertained.

After some debate of a conversational character, the rule relating to the rejection of abolition papers was read, as follows:

"No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territory, or the slave trade between the States or Territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this House, or entertained in any way whatever."

Mr. WISE again urged his point of order, and contended that the whole of the petition evidently came within the spirit of the rule. He conceived that the object of the rule was to dispose of all papers tainted with this abominable heresy.

The question then being taken on the motion of Mr. BLACK to reconsider the vote by which a portion of the petition had been laid on the table, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Andrews, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, John Campbell, Carroll, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coler, Connor, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crockett, Cress, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Galbraith, Garland, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Hammond, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, King, Lane, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McClure, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Samuel W. Morris, Parish, Pope, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Jas. Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Stuart, Swearingen, Swency, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Vroom, Warren, Waterson, Weller, John White, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Worthington—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Boardman, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Casey, Chittenden, Cranston, Edward Davies, Doe, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, Gates, Giddings, Granger, Hall, Henry, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lincoln, Meredith Mallory, Marvin, Calvary Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Peck, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Winthrop—51.

So the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. BLACK here rose and was about to submit his motion for rejecting the whole of the memorial, when

Mr. ADAMS wished to make an observation.

Mr. WISE, I claim the floor.

Mr. BLACK. As the vote was reconsidered on my motion, I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. ADAMS. No, sir, I claim the floor.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the gentleman from Virginia had the floor.

Mr. ADAMS. But I have the floor on a point of order which I desire to make.

The SPEAKER then decided that as the gentleman from Massachusetts rose to a point of order, he of course was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ADAMS was understood to say that as the vote to lay on the table had been reconsidered, his motion of reference of the whole subject would necessarily come up again for consideration.

Mr. WISE again rose to claim the floor.

Mr. ADAMS persisted in his claim to it, and was proceeding, when

Mr. WISE, in a very loud tone, said he cared not what the gentleman from Massachusetts claimed, for he (Mr. W.) claimed the floor, and wished to inquire of the CHAIR what it was that had been laid on the table, the vote on which has just been reconsidered.

The SPEAKER informed him that it was that portion of the petition coming within the rule; and the question then pending was on the motion previously made to lay it on the table.

After some further debate of a conversational character, and which, owing to the confusion which prevailed, could not be distinctly heard—

Mr. CONNOR explained; that when the petition was presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he (Mr. C.) was just taking his seat, and moved to lay on the table that portion which came within the rule; but he was afterwards convinced that the whole of the petition came within the rule, and he therefore now withdrew his motion to lay a part only on the table.

Mr. BLACK having succeeded in getting the floor, asked whether it would not now be in order for him to move the rejection of the whole of the petition.

Mr. WISE. No, for it is already rejected under the rule.

Mr. BLACK said it was a mistake, for the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to refer was still pending, and a motion had been made by some one to lay a portion of the petition on the table, he cared not by whom, but—

Mr. WISE. But the motion cannot be made, for it is already laid on the table, under the rule.

Mr. BLACK wished to explain, when

Mr. WISE persisted in urging his point of order, that the petition had already been laid on the table, under the standing rule of the House.

Mr. BLACK said he wished to move the rejection of the whole of the petition, on the ground that a certain portion of it had been decided by the Speaker as not coming within the rule. If it should be permitted that petitions should be received, a part of which came within the rule and a part of which did not come within the rule, that would be nothing less than a fraud upon the House. He was, therefore, for rejecting the whole.

Mr. WISE could not see how a motion to reject the whole could be in order; for one portion of the petition had already been rejected by the decision of the Chair. But he (Mr. W.) contended that no part of it ought to have been received. After some further remarks, Mr. W. said if the gentleman from Georgia would alter his motion so as to embrace only that part of the petition which the Speaker had decided could be received, he would go with him.

Mr. ADAMS here rose, and in the course of some remarks, the whole of which the uproar did not permit the Reporter to hear, denounced the standing rule of the House prohibiting the reception of Abolition papers, as an infamous and unconstitutional rule.

Mr. CRAIG rose to a point of order. He contended that the question as it then stood was not debatable.

Mr. ADAMS. No: only on one side.

Mr. CRAIG said the question, as it now stood, was precisely the same as if no vote had been taken on the original motion of Mr. ADAMS.

Many members here attempted to speak at once, and much confusion prevailed.

After order had been restored,

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the debate was not in order except on that portion of the petition which he conceived did not come within the rule.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. WISE and BLACK—

Mr. ADAMS again took the floor and said he had presented the whole of the petition, and so long as he had a voice in the House, he would continue to present them. Mr. A. was proceeding to make some remarks in relation to the observations of Mr. WISE that "he would have combated the decision of the SPEAKER, had his attention been called to the petition when presented," when

Mr. WISE called the gentleman from Massachusetts to order for a disorderly expression. Mr. W. then stated what he understood the member to charge, viz: that he, Mr. W. had said he would have dictated to the Speaker. Such was not the fact; as every gentleman on the floor knew that he had said no such thing.

Mr. ADAMS explained that he had not made such a charge. What he said was in relation to what the member from Virginia did, and not what the member said he would have done.

Mr. WISE denied that he ever said he would have dictated to the Speaker, or that such was his intention. Mr. W. made some further observations which could not be distinctly heard.

Mr. ADAMS explained that the gentleman from Virginia had mistook his meaning. What he (Mr. A.) had reference to was the manner in which that gentleman usually addressed the Speaker.

Mr. WISE said he regretted nothing so much a personal quarrel with the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts; but he must be permitted to say that there was no man in the House more capable of exhibiting dictatorial feelings than that gentleman; and he was now setting an example for the younger members.

The SPEAKER, in reply to a question from Mr. BLACK, decided that a motion to reject could apply only to so much of the petition as had been decided did not come under the rule.

From this decision Mr. BLACK took an appeal, and contended that the petition could not be separated, for it was one and the same thing.

Mr. B. then commenced reading the petition with a view of proving his proposition.

Mr. ADAMS desired to inquire of the gentleman whether it was in order to read that which the House had determined it would not receive.

Mr. BLACK said he was reading the petition with a view of showing that the Speaker had committed an unintentional error in not rejecting the whole.

The SPEAKER observed that the reading of that portion of the petition which came within the rule, could not be read but by general consent.

Mr. ADAMS said that unless the whole subject should be thrown open to debate, he would object.

The SPEAKER then remarked that, as objection had been made, the gentleman from Georgia would not be in order in reading the petition.

After some debate on this point between Messrs. BLACK, WISE, and CRAIG, the noise was so great that several members rose to order.

Mr. WINTHROP called for order all over.

Mr. BLACK again contended that one portion of the petition could not be rejected without the other; and if one part was received, so must the other be. Besides, if this practice was to be adopted, then thousands of petitions might be introduced into the House like so many fire brands, in defiance of any resolution that might be adopted.

The hour having now expired, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

And the bill authorizing the issue of being the special order, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the Chair, and resumed the consideration thereof.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON being entitled to the floor, proceeded at some length to criticize the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to give his views in relation to the contemplated means of meeting any deficiency in the revenue.

Mr. RHETT followed, and was about to show that there was no need either of a loan, or the imposition of a tariff on wines, silks, etc. as contended by some; but that the present bill would afford ample means for relieving the Treasury; when

A motion that the committee rise, was made, and prevailed.

So the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The House then adjourned.

The bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana; and

The bill to confirm certain land claims in the Greensburg land district, State of Louisiana; and was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Juan Belgar was taken up, and after a debate in which Messrs. MOUTON, LINN, and KING, advocated the bill, and Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, opposed acting on it at present, the bill was laid on the table.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, and having been read through, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommit the bill with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States,

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate at length, answering fully and satisfactorily the charges of extravagance against the present Administration made yesterday by Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. CRITTENDEN replied at length; and after some further remarks from Messrs. BUCHANAN and CRITTENDEN,

Mr. CALHOUN obtained the floor, and after some remarks on the subject of Executive and party responsibility for extravagance in expenditure, he announced his intention of discussing the subject before them—the distribution bill in connection with the protective system—but many Senators requesting him to yield to a motion for adjournment, he assented,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1841.

Mr. BLACK inquired whether the first business in order was not the appeal which he took from the decision of the CHAIR on yesterday, (who decided "that so much of the petition as prays that no new State may be admitted into the Union, the Constitution of which may tolerate slavery, did not come within the prohibition of the rule, and that, therefore, that part of the petition has been received.")

The SPEAKER replying in the negative,

Mr. BLACK moved to suspend the rules, in order that the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday might be disposed of.

Mr. J. W. JONES hoped that the motion would not prevail, and that the House would proceed to the consideration of the special order, viz: the Treasury note bill.

Mr. BLACK then submitted his motion in writing, that the morning hour be appropriated to the disposition of the appeal which he took on yesterday from the decision of the CHAIR relative to the reception of certain petitions then presented.

Mr. ADAMS said that he understood this to be a motion to resume the presentation of petitions. He had a bundle of petitions, and wanted to get rid of them, and he knew that that was the case with the gentleman [Mr. CARR] who asked to present petitions yesterday, to which he (Mr. A) objected, because petitions were not called for in order.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and decided in the negative.

Mr. J. W. JONES then moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the Treasury Note bill.

Mr. RUSSELL said that as this was the day appropriated by the rules to the consideration of private business, he would move to suspend the special order until Monday next, for the purpose of taking up the private calendar.

But the motion of Mr. JONES having precedence, the question was taken thereon by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. So the House determined to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the

TREASURY NOTE BILL, and accordingly resumed the consideration thereof, (Mr. CASEY in the chair.)

Mr. RHETT being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday, in which he had commenced an argument to show that neither a loan of ten millions, nor a new tariff on silks, etc. would be necessary; but that the present bill would furnish ample means for relieving the Treasury.

Mr. R. proceeded to controvert the arguments of Mr. EVANS, in relation to the amount of expenditures chargeable on the present year. He adverted to the item referred to by Mr. E. of two and a half millions chargeable upon 1841, for the forces in Florida. Now, he, Mr. R. contended that the charge had not yet arisen, nor would it arise, unless Congress should pass the bill, authorizing the enlistment of 1500 mounted men and 500 foot.

Mr. EVANS explained that this charge had already been incurred, and was designed chiefly for the pay of two thousand militia, called into the regular service in Florida, under the law authorizing the acceptance of the services of militia for three months. These men, he urged, had been thus engaged from three months to three months, and it was for the payment of forces already taken into the service that the money was due.

Mr. RHETT was understood to maintain that here was nothing in the estimates to show that these militia were now in the service, and for all he or the gentleman knew, they might have been disbanded. Mr. R. contended that, however that might be, the item for the Florida war was not necessarily a portion of the expenditure for the present year. For, as the present Administration went out of power on the 4th of March, it was not certain that the next Administration would continue that war. So thus it did not necessarily follow that this item should be charged upon the expenditures of 1841, as urged by the member from Maine.

Mr. R. then proceeded to vindicate the Secretary of the Treasury in the views that officer had taken in respect to the appropriations for the present year, and the unexpended balances of former appropriations.

As regarded an assertion that a million of dollars for the Post Office would be chargeable on the expenditures of 1841, Mr. R. contended that such would not be the fact. He read extracts from the report of the Postmaster General, to show that although the Department might occasionally require a temporary assistance, yet, upon the whole, it was capable of maintaining itself from its own resources.

Having adverted to the great amounts set down in the estimates for the Florida war, the navy pension fund, etc. which could not be strictly chargeable to the expenditures until actually required, and passed upon by Congress, Mr. R. next proceeded to review the means calculated upon by the Secretary of the Treasury for meeting the engagements of Government for the present year, and which he maintained would be most ample.

Mr. R. said he could not help but notice the inconsistency of the opponents of the present Administration. For when he first took his seat on that floor, the cry of those gentlemen was "retrenchment," "retrenchment," and they were blaming the Administration for alleged extravagance. But how was it now? Why, they had turned round and were at this time loud in their denunciations against the Administration for meanness and parsimony. He, Mr. R. if he did not mistake the signs of the times, thought he foresaw, as soon as the new Administration should come into power, that the country would be deluged with a full tide of extravagance.

Mr. R. after some further remarks in relation to the course he anticipated the next Administration would pursue, proceeded to combat the idea entertained by some, that a tax upon luxuries would not diminish their consumption. He admitted, however, that a tax upon necessities would have that effect, as the case of the poor English laborer proved, when at least two-thirds of his hard earnings were taken by taxation.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said, if the gentleman referred to his remarks on yesterday, he would explain what he meant. It was that wines and silks, being articles of luxury, were consumed by the rich; and, so far as they were concerned, an advance of price would furnish an additional recommendation for their use, instead of diminishing the consumption.

Mr. RHETT proceeded, and went into a long argument to show how injuriously a tariff on silk would affect the commerce between the Eastern States and France. He contended that if this commerce shall be interrupted in any degree, it must necessarily operate injuriously upon the South; for, if the French people could not send their silks in return for the millions of the raw material of cotton imported by them from this country, how could it do otherwise than affect the interests of the cotton growers. If a duty should be laid upon the French silks, how could they pay for the seventeen millions of exported cotton? By placing a duty on silks, would any gentleman undertake to say that it would not diminish the value of cotton?

A tax upon imports would always effects the exports of a country, and if the views of those gentlemen in favor of laying a tariff on silk should be carried out, the effect must necessarily be to reduce the price of that staple by which the commerce was carried on. For it would be admitted by all, that cotton was, in fact, the currency with which the whole commerce of this country was carried on; and if a tax should be laid on what that cotton brought into the country, it must necessarily derange the prices of it?

Mr. R. then proceeded to argue that, in the first place, there existed no necessity for raising any additional means; and if there did, there was no necessity for raising it on this particular article, silk.

Until yesterday he had been utterly at loss to conceive why this project of laying a duty on silk had been introduced. But from the remarks of an honorable Senator he now comprehended the drift. It appeared that the revenue from this source was to supply the deficiency which would arise from the contemplated distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. Here the mystery was explained. He now understood it well, and in that case there would be a necessity for some such measure. But in the present condition of the Treasury, there was no call for it.

Mr. R. then gave, at some length, his views in relation to the compromise act, its intent and character. He controverted the argument assumed yesterday by his colleague from South Carolina, [Mr. W. THOMPSON,] that that act was a permanent arrangement—a settled principle of action beyond the day assigned by the limitation on the face of it. Once, indeed—taking his views rather from the speeches of honorable gentlemen than from a close scrutiny of the act itself—he had been under the impression that it was permanent. Such, however, was not his opinion now. So far from regarding it as fixing a permanent and illimitable principle, he declared his conviction that it did not live one day beyond the 6th of March, 1842; and that, after that day, not a single dollar could be collected from customs under its provisions. He believed the law to be unconstitutional, and he did not regard it as binding upon him. These views Mr. R. discussed at great length.

In conclusion, he expressed the opinion that the tariff question ought not to be touched now—that it should lie over to the next session of Congress, when there ought to be a general re-modelling of duties. The proper course was, to let the incoming administration take up that question, and give us their project in regard to it, if they had any. Sufficient means would, in the interim, be found in the Treasury to answer all their purposes during the year 1841.

He declared his intention to give a fair and honest chance to the administration of General Harrison. No man had ever heard him (Mr. R.) speak speak disrespectfully of that gentleman. And he now avowed that if General Harrison, in the course of policy he might mark out, should stand upon the great Republican principles of '98 and '99, he (Mr. R.) would give him his hearty support. But if he trod in the path of the Federalists of '89—if he advocated a National Bank—the throwing open of the public purse to extravagant expenditures—and the consolidation of this Government in its several branches—he (Mr. R.) would oppose his administration, feeble as his opposition might be, to the utmost extent of his power.

Mr. NISBET was not prepared to say whether or not he would vote for the bill now before the House. He did not know whether the necessity for the measure was as pressing and urgent as has been represented. But there were other questions besides this. The tariff had been alluded to. Now, he (Mr. N.) was not the advocate of a tariff for protection; if he were, he would belie his constituents who sent him here. He had heard from his infancy that it was unjust in its character and destructive to the permanency of the Confederacy, and he hoped he would never change his opinion in regard to that subject.

Mr. N. contended that the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. R.] in relation to protective duties, was quite foreign to the subject under debate, and had not been called out by any remarks previously made. Mr. N. then proceeded to argue that unless the proposed duty on silks amounted to a prohibition of that article, then the argument of the gentleman amounted to nothing. And the question was, whether the proposed duty of 20 per cent. would amount to a prohibition. But, for his part, he disclaimed all prohibitory duties, and if, when he came to vote on the imposition of any duties, he imagined they would operate as such, he would vote against them.

Mr. N. remarked that there was a particular kind of cotton imported for this country by the French, and from which they manufactured their rich laces and muslins so extensively used here. So that in case of a tariff on silk, we should, in those articles, consume an equal portion of our own cotton manufactured by the French themselves.

Mr. N. went on to say that there were but three sources of revenue; First, the public lands; second, from direct taxation; and third, by imposts on importations. As for the public lands, it appeared very little reliance was to be placed on that source, for all classes of politicians were making propositions for yielding the proceeds to the States. These lands were nothing but a bone of contention—a political football, bandied about first by one party and then the other.

As for direct taxation, the recorded wisdom of ages had proved that no plan was more odious or more unequal in its operation. The public mind disowned it, and the sympathies of the Union were against it.

Then the raising of revenue from imports was by far the more reasonable, and he hoped that the coming Administration would announce now, through their accredited organs, that if money should be wanted, they would raise it through the provisions of the compromise act.

After a very glowing appeal in behalf of the poorer classes of this country, and the justice of taxing the rich in all cases where taxes were required at all, Mr. N. recapitulated the three points of his speech, viz: first, that he would vote for no revenue but what the wants of the Government required. Second, that the fact of the Government wanting money being conceded, they had better raise it under the provisions of the compromise act of 1833; and third, when they laid any imposts, let them be so light as not materially to affect the importations, and not to exceed the wants of the Government.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi next obtained the floor, but, without proceeding, he gave way to a motion that the committee rise, which prevailed.

So the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. EVERETT offered the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House a statement of the different articles imported which are now subject to duty at a less rate than twenty per cent. ad valorem, the value of such articles, and the rate per cent. and amount of said duties, based on the imports of 1838.

Before any question was taken on the resolution,

Mr. GRIFFIN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CARR called for the yeas and nays.

But they were not ordered.

And the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, January 23, 1841.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of citizens of Wayne county, New York, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

ments, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. ROANE, the papers in the case of Mrs. Vance were permitted to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

MINERAL LANDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WALKER said he had received from the War Department the report of Dr. King, the agent of the United States for the Lead Mines. This was a report of great research and uncommon ability. It related to the manner of disposing of our mineral lands, and to the development of the resources of the mineral region. This subject had heretofore been referred by the Senate to the Committee on Public Lands, and he had reported a bill for the sale of these lands, which had received the sanction of the Senate. The subject was one of the greatest interest. The mineral region of Missouri and of the Northwest, was already ascertained to exceed the entire area of the great State of Pennsylvania; and by the more recent explorations of those most talented geologists, Dr. Owen and Col. Nicolet, in addition to those of Dr. King, this entire mineral region was believed to exceed the superficies of the two largest States of the Union. It was the most fertile in soil, as well as the richest and most extensive mineral region in the world. Among other valuable minerals in this great region, were iron, lead, copper and zinc. In lead, the quantity produced had augmented from 335,000 pounds in 1823, to 33,000,000 of pounds in 1839; worth, at New York, $1,500,000. We had thus risen in less than a quarter of a century, from nothing to the third on the list of the nations which produced lead; and at the same ratio of augmentation, we should, in twenty years, stand at the head of the list, when it was hoped we might, as we now do, not only supply our own market, but that lead would become a large article of export. As to copper, the importance was still greater. Our imports of copper in 1839 amounted to within a small fraction of $2,000,000. When we considered copper, not only as a coin for small change, but its many valuable uses in manufactures, the importance of the subject would be perceived. To specify no others, the amount of copper used in boilers on steam cars, and for steamboats on the lakes, rivers and ocean, was very great, and increasing every day; and transportation by steam upon the land, and navigation by steam on the water, to a great extent, depended on the use of this valuable mineral. As connected with steam vessels for the navy, the subject was one of the highest national importance, connected intimately with the honor and defence of the country. The copper region of the United States was believed to be richer and more extensive than in any other part of the world. The mining and smelting of this mineral in our country had but recently commenced, but under such circumstances as to promise the most auspicious results. The development of our mineral resources in this whole great region, depended chiefly upon improvements—first in mining, secondly in smelting, and thirdly in the manner of disposing of the mineral lands; and it was to this last subject that he desired to call the attention of the Senate, and upon which very much depended, and which he hoped would be finally adjusted at the next session, after full and mature deliberation. Mr. WALKER said he would only at present move the printing of this valuable report, and of five hundred additional copies for the use of the Senate.

Mr. LINN expressed the pleasure he felt at the introduction of the document. It was certainly a matter of vast importance to the country generally to have the mineral lands disposed of, and the sooner it was effected the better. So long as these lands remained the property of the Government, little would be realized from them. He considered it the worst policy in the world for the Government to hold on for the mere purpose of obtaining a trifling rent. If they were put up for sale, individual enterprise and capital would go to work in developing the mighty resources of the West. The people of the Eastern and Middle sections of this country did not appear to have any adequate idea of the great magnitude of the mineral wealth of the West. Why (said Mr. L.) the mineral region of copper, lead, zinc, manganese, etc. extends from Lake Superior until it falls off into the lower altitudes of a portion of the States of Illinois, Missouri, and the Territory of Wisconsin and Iowa, where the vast coal fields and salt formations commence from the banks of the Ohio to the foot of the spurs of the Rocky Mountains, where you again ascend from this great basin into the Ozark chain of hills. It again commences on the borders of the Mississippi and Missouri, taking a southwestern direction, enabling you to trace the chain through the country of the Keoways, and a portion of the country occupied by the wandering Comanches, where it unites with the mountains bordering on the Rio del Norte. Throughout this vast extent are scattered mineral wealth, inexhaustible in quantity, whole mountains of iron ore, etc. At this time, England is the greatest lead country in the world, producing annually 100,000,000 pounds, while the rest of Europe did not produce more than 50,000,000. In seventeen years the United States had raised from 6,000,000 to 30,000,000. What, with such boundless resources, might not be anticipated in seventeen more? He left for those to answer who could form a proper estimate of this region of country.

Mr. WALKER said he would, at the next session, most cheerfully co-operate with his friend, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN] in devising a system for the sale of the mineral lands, and he most heartily concurred with that Senator in the opinion that these lands should be sold, and not leased, and that in the sale the development of the mineral region was vastly more important than the revenue from the sales; for as to leasing, the nett revenue was little or nothing. The lands must be in the hands, not of lessees, but of proprietors, in order to augment the amount of mineral. In the hands of lessees, we should have little more than those scrapings of the surface of the soil called diggings, which had so extensively prevailed in this region, the power of steam and of the accompanying and improved machinery, never having been employed here, as Mr. W. believed, but in a single instance.

The motion to print was then agreed to.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy communicate to the Senate a statement of the cost of building, in materials and labor respectively, of the ships of the line Columbus, Ohio, Delaware, and North Carolina; the frigates United States, Constitution, Potomac, and Brandywine; the sloops of war John Adams, Boston, Lexington, Vincennes, Warren, Natchez, Falmouth, Fairfield, Vandalla, St. Louis, and Concord; the brigs Porpoise, Dolphin, Pioneer, and Consort; the schooners Grampus, Shark, Enterprise, and Boxer; and the steamship Fulton; and the periods at which those vessels were respectively built. Also, the number of times each of those vessels have been repaired; where so repaired, and the cost of repairing each, both in materials and labor. Also, the first cost of the schooners Pilot and Active, the cost of repairs of the same, and the sums for which the said schooners were sold. Also, the cost of the several navy and dock yards, including the sites, the cost of the buildings and fixtures at each, and the repairs of the same.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

The bill to provide for taking evidence in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States, in certain cases.

The bill for the relief of the executor of Thomas Cooper, deceased.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Aaron Vail, deceased, late consul at L'Orient.

The bill to confirm claims to lands in the district between the Rio Hondo and Sabine rivers.

The bill for the relief of Charles Morgan, of Louisiana.

The bill for the relief of Charles Morgan.

The bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, and having been read through, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate at much length on the distribution bill, the tariff policy, &c. and was replied to by Mr. WEBSTER.

After some further remarks by Messrs. CALHOUN and WEBSTER,

Mr. ALLEN obtained the floor, but yielded to a motion for adjournment,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1841.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. J. W. JONES moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceed to the special order of the day.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped the gentleman would give way, to enable him to report a bill from the Committee of Elections, regulating the taking testimony in cases of contested elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES said he would do so, provided the bill would not take up the morning hour.

Mr. CARR would object, unless all should have an opportunity of presenting their petitions.

Mr. FILLMORE said the bill was a matter of vast importance, and would prove highly beneficial hereafter; and therefore he hoped no objection would be made to its consideration.

Objection being made,

Mr. FILLMORE moved to suspend the rule; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. RUSSELL remarked that, as this was the day set apart for the consideration of private business, he hoped there would not be a solitary objection to postponing the bill before the House until Monday, and proceed now to the reception of petitions.

The objection not being withdrawn,

Mr. RUSSELL called for the yeas and nays; but the motion of Mr. JONES having precedence, the question was taken thereon, and decided in the affirmative.

So the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, being entitled to the floor, after some preliminary remarks, proceeded to say that he should support the present measure before the committee, and oppose all others. He believed the sum asked for by the bill would be more than sufficient to meet the wants of the Treasury.

After showing the fallacy of the constitutional objections raised by some gentleman to the issue of Treasury notes, he went on to show how much more beneficial their issue would be to our own people, whereas a loan would benefit foreign capitalists. In reply to the objections in relation to the notes being bills of credit, he quoted the definition of Chief Justice Marshall of a bill of credit, and showed that the objection could not apply. These notes now asked for, were not intended as money, but merely to raise money. And if Congress had not the power to issue them, neither had it the power to issue bonds or script.

Having satisfied his own mind of the constitutionality of this measure, Mr. T. proceeded to say that it had been clearly demonstrated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] on yesterday, that five millions would be enough, and even more than would be wanted.

But he could not help being amused at the different conclusions to which gentlemen of the Opposition had come.

In the first place, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] had put down the anticipated deficiency at about seven or eight millions of dollars. Next came the gentleman from Maine, who arrived at a different conclusion. Then followed the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] who prophesied that the deficiency would be ten, twelve, or very like fifteen millions. For his own part he was unwilling to go into the various calculations of the gentlemen, although he could not but be amused at their various conclusions.

Last year the Secretary of the Treasury deviated only two millions in the amount of the estimates; and considering the fluctuation of trade and other causes, that was tolerably accurate. And if the Secretary should deviate but two millions in his estimates for the coming year, than the means now asked for, would afford ample means for carrying on the Government.

But here was the grand secret. Here was the main spring of this movement for higher expenditures. Gentlemen of the Opposition were desirous of coming to a sudden conclusion that an extra session must be called. This was the secret spring of action on this matter.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] had a wonderful talent for figures; but on referring to the speech of the gentleman in 1837, when advocating a deposit of the surplus revenue with the States, he stated that there was no question but that at the end of the year, the surplus revenue would amount to between ten and twelve millions of dollars. But now look at his quo animo. At that time the gentleman was desirous to make the surplus revenue appear as large as possible; but now it was his aim to make it appear as small as possible.

As regarded the calculations of the gentleman that there would be a deficiency of between ten and fifteen millions at the end of the present year, he Mr. T. believed them all uncertain. They depended on a variety of causes beyond the reach of human foresight, such as the fluctuations in trade, commerce, and other matters, when no one could foresee the result.

Mr. T. then recapitulated the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the receipts and expenditures for the present year, and said that were the present Administration to continue in power, so well satisfied was he of those estimates in the report, that he would not go for more than three millions instead of five millions of Treasury notes. But, as an adverse Administration was about to come into power, he was willing to give them two millions more than was necessary.

Mr. T. next proceeded to notice the glaring inconsistency of the Opposition in their charges against the Administration within the space of the last twelve months only. For, said he, the party with whom I act are now charged with "mean parsimony;" not more than one year ago, on this floor, we were charged with reckless extravagance, and the cry was echoed and re-echoed from one end of the country to the other.

He was willing to admit that, in his own opinion, the expenditures of the Government before that time had been too large; but what he always contended for was, that the Congress of the United States ought to be treated precisely as a father ought to treat a spoiled boy at college. And what was that way? Why, to cut down the supplies.

Now the supplies were cut down by the necessary operations of trade; and during the whole reign of the present Administration, the taxes had been taken off the people. But now, under the operation of that system, there was no money in the Treasury. Were they, however, to blame the Secretary of the Treasury? Certainly not; for, on the contrary, that officer deserved the thanks of the people.

Mr. T. as a further and most striking illustration of his charge of inconsistency, adverted to the outpouring of Mr. OGLE, last summer, in relation to the furniture of the President's House. That document, said Mr. T. was circulated through Mississippi, and to the remotest part of this Union; and according to it, the furniture was "gorgeous," "regal," "princely," etc, and far too good for any Republican. But we were now told by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] in substance, that the furniture of this same White House was unfit for the place, unsuitable for a gentleman, and that it ought to be sold, and new furniture of American manufacture purchased in its stead!

Now, continued Mr. T. would the country submit to such inconsistency? Would the people suffer the gentleman to blow hot and cold in the same breath? Last year this furniture was cried down from one end of the country to the other, as "regal," "splendid," etc, and too rich for any Democratic citizen in this country; but now the same party were about to take a man from his log cabin, and sell out the same rich furniture as unsuitable for a gentleman, and to refit the whole.

Mr. T. then expressed, with some severity, the unfounded charges in relation to the Choctaw Indians. He was surprised at the charge that the payment of these Indians had been postponed for the purpose of meeting the expenditures of 1841. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] might rest assured that full justice would be done to the Choctaws. But there was another fact in relation to the payment of these Indians. When paid, they were not to be paid in money, but in land. So the argument of the gentleman amounted to nothing.

A more extended report of the remarks of Mr. THOMPSON is in course of preparation.

Mr. LANE said that he did not intend to argue the question before the House as a Harrison man or a Van Buren man, but as a man who had a country to serve. He took it for granted that there was a deficit in the Treasury, and there must continue to be, unless some remedy should be adopted to supply it. He regarded the deficit not temporary, but permanent, and was opposed to the expedient of Treasury notes, which he considered to be bills of credit, and interdicted by the Constitution. But even if it were constitutional to issue them, it would be better to resort to a direct loan to supply the deficit; which, in his opinion, was caused by the paralyzing influence of the Independent Treasury.

Mr. L. replied at some length to the remarks of Mr. THOMPSON, expressing his opinion that a Bank of the United States was constitutional, and said that whenever an opportunity should be presented, he would vote for one. He would vote in favor of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, and also vote for levying duties on imports for the purpose of revenue, but not for protection, although he believed Congress had the constitutional power to do so.

Mr. L. concluded by saying that what was right to be done, ought to be done openly and directly, and not indirectly and covertly; and he was, therefore, in favor of raising ten millions by a direct loan.

Mr. DUNCAN then obtained the floor, and was proceeding in his remarks; when,

On motion, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House now take up his resolution, which, on yesterday, was read for information as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House a statement of the different articles imported which are now subject to duty at a less rate than twenty per cent. ad valorem, the value of such articles, and the rate per cent. and amount of said duties, based on the import of 1838.

Objection being made,

Mr. EVERETT called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE moved that the House adjourn, and thereupon called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 41, nays 47.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. EVERETT,

But, finding itself without a quorum,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

[MONDAY, January 25, 1841.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following report and resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina upon Federal relations; which were read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 18, 1840.

The Committee on Federal Relations, to whom was referred so much of the message of his Excellency the Governor, No. 1, as relates to the election of President of the United States, in the construction of the Constitution, and the future arrangements as to the tariff of duties on imports, have had the same under consideration, and the subject may be divided and considered under the following heads:

1st. The propriety of South Carolina uniting in the election of President and Vice President, especially when, by so doing, she will give expression to her true principles.

2d. The causes which have led to the overthrow of the administration of Mr. Van Buren, whose policy and avowed principles of action are in accordance with the doctrines maintained by this State. This head will properly embrace an inquiry into the pecuniary embarrassments which have induced the people to lend a willing ear to those misrepresentations which have contributed to the success of the Opposition. The policy and constitutionality of a bank, chartered by the United States: The causes of that combination of the different elements, which united to produce a change of administration: This discordant character of those elements: The security which the avowed policy of the Administration afforded to the peculiar interests and institutions of the South; and the strange delusion which has distracted so many of the Southern States, and led them to unite and make common cause with parties, whose avowed principles are at war with the best interests of the South: And, lastly, the confident expectation, that a development of the inconsistent interests and views of this coalition, will in the end vindicate the wisdom and policy of the Democratic Administration.

3d. The growing corruption of our Federal elections.

4th. The resolutions from Connecticut, relating to a tariff of protection.

Upon the first matter, your committee concur with his Excellency, that every State in the Union is bound to unite in the Federal elections, without regard to the fact, whether the successful candidate agrees with us or not, for candidates can always be found, whose principles and character will well merit such an expression of approval; and the conduct of the State, at the present session, has illustrated the propriety of such a course.

Second. The complicated difficulties which embarrass our monetary affairs, arise from the perversion of banks to purposes wholly incompatible with a sound circulation, and an utter disregard to the elementary principles of banking. No idea is more fallacious than the belief that an abundant circulating medium increases the real value of property. The kindly fruits of the earth, and human labor, bestowed in adopting materials in their original state to the use of man, are the only sources of wealth; and trade, or commerce, consists simply in exchange of them. Barter is rendered more convenient by fixing on some one article of exchange as an universal property, exchangeable for every other, and this is called money. Gold and silver have, by general consent, become that universal property, so that he who has it, may exchange it for whatever other property he wants. Thus, if a man has an ox to spare, and wants a horse, he sells his ox for gold or silver, and then he exchanges that for a horse. This is trade and the use of money. It is clear then, that money must be itself valuable. It costs labor to procure it. It is useful for furniture and the arts. So that money only facilitates barter, by being exchangeable for all articles. No more money then is needed, than is sufficient for that purpose, and to thus facilitate all the exchanges of a community. Wherever a country has more money than its exchanges require, it will find its way abroad, to be exchanged for other property. A bank note is not money: it has no value. Money can be used—you can convert a dollar into a silver spoon—but you can make nothing out of a five dollar bill. Like every other promissory note, its value depends upon the fact, that the bank which made it has the ability to redeem its promise, by exchanging it for coin when required. It follows, then, an increase of bank paper is not an increase of money, and when more is used than the bank has means to redeem, the bills become depreciated. It is not true, that an abundance of paper money raises the value of property. It is a mere deception. It only makes paper money cheap. The actual exchanges of a country require a given amount of money; and when banks issue their paper only on real transactions, founded on an actual exchange of property, there will be no redundancy of circulation, and property will retain its natural value; but when the banks lend their notes on mere accommodation paper, they are not represented by actual value, and thus swell the circulation, and give a fictitious value to property. This caused all the derangement of our circulating medium. Banks loaned money, or rather their promises to pay money, when no real exchange had taken place, and consequently their notes being more abundant than the actual business of the country required, depreciated exactly in the ratio of the surplus. Men supposed they were richer because they received more for their property in these notes. Suppose bank notes to be ten per cent. below gold and silver, and two men each have a thousand bushels of wheat to sell; one sells his for a dollar a bushel, and gets bank notes in payment; the other sells his for ninety cents and gets specie. It is clear, the first has made no better bargain than the last, for he who got nine hundred dollars in specie, can exchange it for a thousand dollars in bank paper, and he who got a thousand dollars in paper, can exchange it for no more than nine hundred in specie. When banks exchange or loan their own notes for notes of persons who gave them merely to raise money, and not for actual property transferred, they render the circulation redundant. All loans to Government and corporations for speculative operations; all loans for the purchase of fixed property, as distinguished from mercantile property promptly exchangeable, unless confined to such small portions as may be redeemed by the income or produce, tend to increase the liabilities of a bank beyond its available means, and consequently lead directly to the suspension of specie payments, even supposing the banks to be perfectly honest, and their loans perfectly secure. The Pennsylvania Bank of the United States suspended on 9th October, 1839, and most of the banks South and West did the same. The statement of the situation of the banks on 1st January, 1840, will prove that this general suspension can be traced to a total disregard of the principles of safe banking, and the most unjustifiable use made of the bank capital. On that day the whole bank capital of the Union was $358,442,692, of which but $33,155 was in coin; yet their immediate liabilities were, for their circulation, $106,968,572; deposits $75,696,857; making an aggregate of $182,665,429. It is not astonishing, then, that they suspended specie payments when they owed $149,560,274 more than their specie; yet the public owed the banks at that time $462,896,523. If the public had paid their debt, the banks would have had ample means to have redeemed their circulation and deposits. But no small part of this enormous debt due to the banks was for loans to Governments and to corporations, who were trying experiments, and individuals who borrowed money to buy property on speculation, at prices swelled out of all proportion by these very loans, which augmented the circulation beyond the exchanges, and thus gave a fictitious value, not by making property dear, but money cheap. These fictitious values have given way, but the notes of the borrowers from the banks must be paid in specie or its equivalent. Hence that pecuniary embarrassment, which, by being falsely ascribed to the measures of the General Government, enabled the old adversaries of Democracy, under the new disguise of Whigs, to delude the debtor portion of the community into the belief that a change of Administration would restore that redundant paper circulation which swelled the nominal price of property, and enable them to extricate themselves from their embarrassments. They are promised a United States Bank; a measure, which, if it was possible to carry it into effect, would not fail to bring every State into ruin. But a short time is necessary to expose this imposition, and bring down upon its authors the bitter denunciations of its victims. There are but two modes of creating a United States Bank. The first is a new subscription, which would, if taken from the specie capital of the present banks, about $33,000,000, effectually destroy their ability to continue specie payments. The next is, by a species of legislative galvanism, to resuscitate the old Bank, give it a Federal charter, and constitute it to the depository of the public revenue, under some guarantee to be furnished by its foreign stockholders, for the safety of the public moneys. This necessarily supposes the resumption of specie payments by that Bank, and her control over all State banks. This measure will give the control of all the revenue of the Union to the foreign holders of that stock, and thus perpetuate the Federal dynasty who have so successfully employed the means placed in their hands. It would enable the wealthy capitalists to bring the property of the debtors of the State banks to the hammer, at depreciated prices, and thus swell the fortunes of the rich at the expense of the public. Such an institution is so utterly at variance with the whole nature and provisions of the Constitution, that it is to be hoped the representatives of the people will resist it. It is clear that the new dynasty must stand or fall on the bank question. If there is created a United States Bank, the Independent Treasury will be abandoned, and the people must at the next election decide on the justice of its fate. If no such bank is created, the only alternative is to deposit the revenue in the State banks, a measure repudiated by a majority of both the great Federal and Democratic parties, or to continue the very measure of Mr. Van Buren's administration, in opposition to which was rallied the celebrated coalition called the Whig party; a proceeding which would at once place in bold relief the flagrant injustice done to that statesman. While your committee duly appreciate the value of banks, when properly conducted, they consider any connection between them and Government, except in the ordinary course of dealing as customers, of the most sinister consequences, and inconsistent with the purity and independence of both. The true objects of banks should be known, as on their conduct depends the future welfare of our whole country; and a right understanding of the subject will prevent unfounded prejudice on the one side, which may refuse to the public the benefits which, properly regulated, they can bestow; and, on the other hand, ward off those evils which their abuse has already spread over our whole country. The real uses of banks are, 1st. To afford safe places of deposit for money; 2d. Expeditious and safe means of payments, by checks in lieu of counting; 3d. By requiring a smaller amount of coin to conduct exchanges, by dispensing with a part of their specie, and substituting their bills, when, by judicious management, the credit of the bank is preserved unquestioned. The money thus released, is actually employed as capital; and by temporary loans, gives renewed and reiterated activity to trade. The very fact, that they issue bills exceeding their money capital; requires that their loans should be short, that they may be always ready to redeem their circulation as fast, as in the round of business, it is brought in. A loan office only lends its actual capital, and as long as the interest is punctually paid, requires no change of investment. 4. They enable commercial men to extend their dealings beyond their actual capital. Thus if a merchant has ten thousand dollars capital to invest in an enterprise, he can safely borrow thirty thousand dollars, and the bank can securely loan it if his known character for prudence, warrant, that by insurance and other precautions, he will not lose, if unsuccessful, more than a fourth of the amount embarked in the enterprise. In a word, money is only a machine to circulate property, and paper costing little or nothing, is a cheaper machine, but it always supposes its redemption in coin unquestionable. These are the legitimate uses of banks. They are not designed to loan money to Government, and when employed for that purpose, it is a fraud upon the people, and operates as a forced loan, if it is made in bills of the bank. Money loaned to Government, represents no property. It is expended in gunpowder; and leaves, when once used, nothing behind, any more than the powder itself, after it is exploded. But it swells the circulation, and thus depreciates its value, and when carried to a great extent, leads to the measure adopted in England, a legalized suspension of specie payments, and a compulsory tender of bank promises, instead of real, actual money. The prevailing notion, even among merchants, that banks are necessary to facilitate exchanges between the States, especially that a United States Bank is so necessary, is a fallacy, which is capable of demonstration to those who will forget their prejudices and submit themselves to the guidance of reason. First, then—banks never have been used, and are not intended to deal in exchange between nation and nation. The quantity of exchange depends on the amount of property transmitted, generally speaking, and bills originate with the merchant. If a merchant in Charleston transmits a thousand bales of cotton to Liverpool, he has funds to draw upon, and the importer who owes for a cargo of English goods, seeks that bill to remit in payment. It is a proper duty of a bank to discount the bills coming to maturity, where its own capital is located. Thus, the Bank of England discounts bills payable in London; but a bill payable in Charleston, would not be discounted at the Bank of England; neither should a bill payable in London, be discounted in Charleston. It tends to swell the current of exchange beyond the actual transactions of trade, and introduces that species of bills termed kites, by which two parties at each end of the line, by drawing and redrawing, use exchange as a species of accommodation paper to raise money, not to facilitate exchange of actual products or merchandise. All legitimate exchange is calculated upon the basis of specie; the only money of commerce. There is no real difference between the several States of this Union, and the several countries of the world, who deal together. The value of the bills of the Bank of England or France, does not effect exchange. It is not necessary to the trade between France and England, the bills of either kingdom should be current in the other. They are not so in fact, and exchanges are not impeded. The truth is, bank paper, not convertible at will into specie, is no currency at all, but is worse than a delusion. If every State permitted no bank paper not redeemable; if suspension was death, as it ought to be every where, a United States Bank is altogether useless. But even a United States Bank would not make its bills redeemable, except at the branches where they were issued. The former bank, to avoid this, even in relation to five dollar bills, drew five dollar drafts on its branches, which, of course, became payable only where accepted. The command of the exchange of the country, gave that bank the opportunity of making bills of exchange the substitute for local discount, thus overburdening the exchanges, enhancing the prices, and thus avoiding the restriction on the rate of discounts, and causing the balances of exchange to depend, not on the balance of trade, but the balance of kiting. When the revolution of 1837 took place, millions of the fictitious exchange was brought to light. It is not wanted to loan its promises to Government, for when Government is under the necessity of borrowing, which ought never to be, except under temporary emergencies, its own security, by being taken as an investment, would not derange the currency, and is the legitimate security for public loans. The privilege of having the notes of a United States Bank, whenever redeemable, receivable for duties, would at once enable it to cripple the State Banks: they, in turn, must insist on the payment of the four hundred millions due them by the people, and in less than two years, the bitter fruits of Whig experiments would be tasted. So far from making money plenty, it would reduce the circulation of the State banks, and reduce property to its value under the hammer. The unfounded allegation that Gen. Harrison's election would raise the value of property, is already in part exposed. He is elected, and yet money remains the same; property the same. The more cunning part of his advocates, are hoarding their means to buy at a sacrifice, the estates of the dupes who united with them in clamoring for change. The mild and gradual effect of the separation of the Government from banking, the gradual return to the collection of the revenue in money, and the Independent Treasury, were efficacious remedies for a redundant circulation. The hope that any change of Administration could save one whose obligation, payable by the laws and Constitution, in specie, is outstanding, for property brought at prices swollen by speculations and a depreciated circulation, from the consequent loss, was too fallacious for an honest Democratic Administration to hold out; and the proposal to cripple all the State banks by placing a regulator, with chartered privileges, to compel them to call in four hundred millions of debts, is the most cruel mockery; and the curses of a ruined country, deep and loud, too, will fall upon its authors. The Independent Treasury, and a well advised general bankrupt law, applicable to all dealers, was the true means of relief. Now, the wealthy capitalists alone, have any prospect of profiting by this reiterated experiment of a Federal rule, which has always ended in disappointment to the people. Not only is a United States Bank unnecessary, but the idea of its money being in fact any better than the money of specie paying banks of the States, where its branches are situated, is chimerical, except for the unjust monopoly of being receivable in payment of duties, although not redeemable in specie where so paid; a monopoly, the fruits of which are reaped by foreign stockholders. Such an institution is evidently unconstitutional, and the existence of such a bank is only a proof how pressing emergencies form an excuse for a departure from principle, and how readily good men slide into the foul heresy in morals, that "the end justifies the means."

The constitutional objection to a bank, chartered by the United States, has never been fairly met; and as human reason is just as clear now as ever it was, the time has arrived when the people will again resort to first principles, and test the point by sound and connected argument. Let us trace the history of this institution from its first embryo. In 1780, during the Revolutionary war, the Bank of North America was chartered by the continental Congress. The inducement was, that the bank was to furnish the army 3,000,000 rations, and 370 hhds. rum, and receive in payment bills of exchange on our Minister in Europe. The subscription or capital was to be in gold and silver. Even then so jealous were the statesmen of that day, that they required "every evening except Sundays, a statement of the cash account, and of notes issued and received, to be delivered to the superintendent of the finances of America." The exigencies of the country were the excuse, and the States were requested to carry into effect its provisions by State laws. Thus, a United States Bank was known prior to the Constitution, and was the subject of the debate in the convention. This bank took a charter from Pennsylvania afterwards. The question generally of giving to Congress power to grant acts of incorporation, and also to incorporate a bank, Mr. Madison says was fully considered, and the power refused; and now the question arises, has Congress that power? As to the array of great names in favor of the position, it is enough to say, the present generation are endowed with the same intellectual powers as their predecessors, and with the same facts before them, can arrive at as wise a conclusion; and the pressure of State necessity being removed, they have a better prospect of arriving at the conclusions of unbiassed reason. The United States, and its Congress, possess no inherent power or original existence, as a body politic, but is supposed solely of such sovereign powers as the States have by the Constitution granted. It results that the omission to grant is a prohibition to the exercise of any of the powers appertaining to a Government. The people of the several States, as independent and sovereign powers, possessed all the attributes of nations, and so much and no more of those attributes as are in terms surrendered to it, by the instrument which created the United States Government, appertains to it.

It is admitted that the United States is a Government capable of sustaining its existence, and not a mere league; but the limits of its authority are delineated in the Constitution, without which it has no existence, and beyond which it can exercise no legitimate authority. Let us then look into this instrument for the authority to create a body corporate, and grant to it the monopoly of having its promises to pay in coin received in every quarter of the Union for the duties and dues of the United States, and the use of its revenues to be loaned out on the promissory notes of individuals, and to receive the interest, for the equivalent of paying the deposits where required. Power was refused when asked in direct terms, and let us apply the celebrated rule, "to ask the law-giver what he meant," and it is clear that he did not intend that to be implied which he had expressly refused. But independent of this refusal, the terms of the Constitution cannot be construed to imply such a power. It has been inferred from the power "to lay and collect taxes for the general welfare." To incorporate a bank, lays no tax for any purpose. Alexander Hamilton, the great originator of such a bank, told the honest truth as to what it was intended to be: "It is to be considered that such a bank is not a mere matter of private property, but a political machine of the greatest importance to the State." Congress has no power to raise money to invest in a bank, any more than in a whaling voyage, or any other money making business. The term "general welfare" is used to designate the object of raising taxes. If every thing that will bring money into the public purse, is authorized under the power to raise taxes, then charters to fishing companies, fur companies, and companies for all purposes of trade and manufacture, by requiring a bonus, would bring money into the public purse. Yet no such charters were ever applied for. To exact a bonus for a charter is not a tax, but the price of a Government grant of a monopoly; and a monopoly is so much taken from the mass of the people, to be conferred on a privileged class. The right does not result from the power "to borrow money." A bank charter borrows no money. It is a fearful stretch of construction to imply it is a "necessary and proper" way to borrow money, to call into existence a corporation to lend it—not to lend its money, but its promissory notes. The power is to borrow money. Now, by the Constitution, Congress may "coin money, and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." No other money was then known. Paper bills of credit, were never known as money, but a substitute for it. Who ever heard of engraving money? Neither is it "necessary and proper," or either, to create a corporation, to aid in laying and collecting taxes, or to create a lender, that Congress may borrow. It would apply as well to trust companies, loan offices, and whaling companies. These might be taxed, or they might lend their notes, or even their money; but are they both "necessary and proper?" The people may be taxed, and money may be borrowed of individuals. The States have the right to prohibit the circulation as money of any thing but gold and silver; and yet if Congress have the power to incorporate a Bank, they must protect its issues, punish the forgery of them, and thus usurp a clear State right, by implication. Every implication of a grant is confined to such as are direct and both necessary and proper, in the usual and natural acceptance of the terms, else it leads to unlimited power. Every means become in its term an end, and thus justifies the use of means still more remote, until absolute power is attained; and this is pure Federal doctrine. Thus, the United States may borrow money. To borrow money, it is necessary and proper, that there should be an accumulation of capital. To accumulate capital we must have a bank, with power to engrave bank notes. There can be no bank of limited responsibility without a charter, and prudent men will not unite in a general responsibility; and therefore, Congress, having the power to borrow money, has, by necessary implication, the power to incorporate stockholders with limited responsibility. Thus, the charter is the means of creating the bank. The bank is the means of collecting the capital, and multiplying it thence to ten fold, and this is the means of enabling the bank to lend, and the United States "to borrow money." There is no power which the most unprincipled ambition might covet, which could not be attained by the same course of reasoning. Apply it to the power to lay taxes; a corporation may be taxed, but to tax we must create it; therefore, under the power to lay taxes, Congress may create a manufacturing company, and impose a tax or bonus. Impressment into the navy, and a conscription for the army, are legalized in the same way. This is Federalism, now in the ascendant. Strict construction is the polar star of Democracy, destined again to emerge from its eclipse.

A corporation is a new creation: it is a person not before existing, and its creation is an act of sovereign power, not delegated. Had it been either necessary or proper, it would have been as expressly granted as it was positively refused. An idea once prevailed that the prohibition, to the States, to emit bills of credit, by implication, conferred that power on Congress, and so it might create a bank to emit paper money. If so, all bills of State banks are unconstitutional. But, in the first place, a chartered bank is not Congress, and delegated power cannot be sub-delegated. But the whole error is founded upon a misapprehension of what "bills of credit" are. They are promises based on the credit of a State, and not notes based on a bank capital. This has been decided and admitted. The argument chiefly relied upon, by the advocates of a national bank, is that of the late Chief Justice Marshall, venerable for his wisdom and experience; but that gift of God which is bestowed upon mankind in every age—the power of reason—is still more venerable. An individual may be influenced by motives, or deluded by the pressure of circumstances; but right reason, when unclouded by prejudice, is more to be relied on than the authority of any human being. Great and good men have maintained some monstrous doctrines. Judge Marshall's argument is all condensed in these words: "The Government, which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select its means," and any exception must be proved. This doctrine leads to the inevitable conclusion that Congress is supreme. It must raise an army; conscription is a means; there you must show that it is prohibited. It can borrow money; therefore it can incorporate companies, and grant monopolies, within the States, to obtain a bonus. It at once breaks down every barrier of the Constitution, and makes the United States a consolidated nation; for of course the States cannot gain say what the United States select as a means. Had such a doctrine been uttered by the dying breath of Washington, it would be our duty to challenge it, as treason, to the sovereignty of the States.

Your committee conclude that the uncompromising hostility of the Democratic Administration to a National Bank deserves our most cordial approbation; and that the adoption of that measure, as a leading and fundamental principle of the new Administration, stamps it indelibly, as in its very essence, the legitimate exponent of Federalism, and calculated to inflict upon the country lasting misery and ruin.

Your committee consider the Independent Treasury as strictly in accordance with the Constitution, and well calculated to place the commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of the country upon a permanent and prosperous basis. By withdrawing from all connection with trade, it leaves the banking interests to be regulated by the States. By collecting the revenue in the coin of the country, it neither opposes or fosters these institutions, but leaves them to be estimated by those who deal with them. If their notes are equal to specie, those who possess them have no difficulty in converting them into money when required for duties. If they are not so convertible, then they are not equal to money, and the United States ought not to receive doubtful paper in payment of debts due to the public. There would have been no outcry against the collection of the revenue in money, but from the consciousness that the bills of specie paying banks are not as good as specie. A specie paying bank to-day, may be a suspended bank to-morrow. Returns and exhibits have proved no security. A bank which is guilty of a fraudulent issue of paper, beyond its ability to redeem it, will hesitate little to cover that fraud by false statements. When we see the largest bank in the Union, and once graced with a United States charter, circulating the bills of an extinct institution, based on no capital, what confidence can be placed in the mere integrity of banks, or the fidelity of their statements? It then results, that either in the United States must guaranty the continuance of the solvency of the banks, or the persons who pay the duties must ascertain it by the actual exchange of the bills for money; a proceeding which can cause no difficulty, except where the banks are really not deserving of credit.

The right to lend money collected as duties or taxes, and thus convert it into notes under any guarantee, is in conflict with the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

The next general feature of the administration of the present Chief Magistrate, deserving the cordial approbation of every slaveholding State, was the determined policy early avowed, to withhold his sanction to any measure impairing the reserved rights of the South, in relation to her slave population. While we feel an abiding confidence in the readiness and ability of our State to protect its rights by those means which God and Nature have accorded to us, and never doubted the noble spirit and elevated patriotism of our citizens, to meet any emergency, and repel any aggression, and are resolved not to discuss rights which we permit no one to question, we must cordially approve that faithful and just adherence to the Constitution, which will save our citizens of other States from endangering the Union by their folly and fanaticism, and involving themselves in a conflict that will not be abandoned as long as Carolina has one faithful citizen left to die in defence of her integrity as a State, her interest, or her honor.

Your committee unite with the Executive in amazement at that delusion which could induce any Southern State to abandon an Administration which adhered most faithfully to the doctrines which they have struggled to maintain since 1800, and hazard their interest by coalescing with a party to which is allied the Federalists and Abolitionists; the advocates of a National Bank, and the persevering solicitors of a tariff of protection; and while we rejoice to find ourselves associated on the one side with Virginia, the very nursery of Democracy and State rights, and on the other, by our own offspring, the enlightened people of Alabama, we feel no unkindness towards our immediate neighbors, and are confident, relying on their general good sense and right feelings, that the moment the development of the true character of the combined and allied opponents of Democracy is exposed, they will promptly and cheerfully unite once more with us in sustaining a common cause, with a sincerity and zeal worthy of their elevated character, and their devotion to the rights and interests of the South. And your committee concur with his Excellency in the belief that the people of every section of the Union, firm in their principles, and resolved in their purposes, will once more rally in the great cause of Democracy, and reinstate in office its original and unwavering disciples.

That the late election for President of the United States was corrupt and indecent—wholly unworthy of a sober and discreet public, and calculated to degrade our country in the eyes of the world, observation and rumor, too well founded, it is believed, induces us to lament. The resort to silly pageantries, ridiculous emblems, and vulgar dissipation, was an insult upon the dignity of freemen, and could only proceed from an utter contempt of their intelligence, and a readiness to degrade them to the level of the servile populace of transatlantic monarchies. That funds to a vast amount were lavished, was palpable; and when it is recollected that the prize to be gained by opposition, was the control of the revenues of the Union, the resuscitation of an expiring moneyed institution, whose stock is so largely owned abroad, and, above all, the delusive hope that there was a magic in change that would relieve men from the losses of improvidence or misfortune, there is great reason to conclude that the elective franchise was polluted by most extensive bribery and corruption.

There was a feature too, in the late election, still more odious. Men high in station, and surrounded by the respect of the public, going about the country, inflaming the passions, alarming the fears, and misleading the judgment of the people, was a spectacle degrading to the whole country, degrading to us as a moral and high minded people, and can only be ascribed to that peculiarity in the human character, which leads men, banded together for a common purpose, to do what, as individuals, they would revolt at and repudiate. When men of character would assert, in the face of day, that the distribution of the public treasure, raised by the Representatives of the people and paid away by appropriations made by law, was usurping "the power of the purse," which every one knows to be the power to raise money without the consent of the people; and, still more absurd, that they should represent militia men, called out to drill, ten days in the year, as a standing army, we are amazed at the self-complacency that did not blush at the deception. No; the unpardonable sin of the present Administration was, its repudiating a chartered monopoly, to receive and loan the public treasure, and retaining it in the Treasury of the United States—its gradual return to a sound constitutional currency—and its resolution, not to entangle Government with any money dealers or stock-jobbers—but to leave to the States to regulate their banking institutions as they deem best; and upon the wisdom and policy of this great measure, South Carolina concurs with it, and is ready to renew the expression of its sanction and approval.

This State has only to repeat her objections to a tariff for a protection, and when the tariff compromise ends, she expects a fair adjustment of a new tariff for revenue, in name and in fact. The result of the election of President has not shaken the faith of South Carolina, in her long cherished principles, and your committee recommend the adoption of these resolutions:

1. Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, a bank, chartered by the United States, and whose notes are made receivable in payment of the public dues, is contrary to the spirit and intent of the Constitution; is not warranted by any express grant of power to Congress; and is unnecessary and impolitic.

2. Resolved, That the collection of the revenue of the United States in gold and silver coin, is strictly constitutional, and well calculated to preserve a sound circulating medium; and the keeping the public funds in the Treasury of the United States, instead of entrusting them to the custody of any incorporated company, is in conformity to the provisions of the Constitution, and is politic and safe.

3. Resolved, That the power given to Congress, to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imposts, does not authorize Congress to collect money, except for revenue, and that a tariff to protect the industry of one portion of the community, at the expense of another, is a violation of the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States; and when such a case occurs, the several States will decide for themselves the mode and measure of redress.

4. Resolved, That the general principles and policy of the administration of Martin Van Buren, are approved by this Legislature, and are well calculated to preserve the perpetuity of the Union, by an equal and just protection of the rights of every section; thus avoiding the necessity of any State resorting to her own means of self-defence, to secure unimpaired her institutions and her rights.

5. Resolved, That this State has seen, with great satisfaction, the steady and consistent adherence of her Senator, John C. Calhoun, to the well known, avowed, and mature principles of the State, and they accord to him their deliberate and strong approval, for vindicating and upholding the settled and well known doctrines of the State from which he holds his high commission.

6. Resolved, That the people of this State have cause to congratulate themselves, that the party feuds which lately weakened the vigor of its counsels, have happily ceased, and that South Carolina now presents to the enemies of her policy and peace, an undivided front; and is prepared, as she is resolved, to repel, by all proper means, every aggression upon her rights as a sovereign republic, the instant that aggression is attempted.

7. Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing Report and Resolutions, to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with instructions to submit them to that body.

Resolved, That the House do agree to the report. Ordered, that it be sent to the Senate for concurrence.

By order: T. W. GLOWER, C. H. R.

IN THE SENATE, December 18, 1840.

Resolved, That the Senate do agree to the report. Ordered, that it be returned the House of Representatives.

By order: WM. E. MARTIN, C. S.

On motion by Mr. PRESTON, the resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law.

Mr. C. said that while he took pleasure in presenting this memorial, his own opinions on the subject were unchanged. He believed that the passage of a voluntary bankrupt law by the Federal Government, would be unconstitutional; and the passage of a law with the involuntary principle, impolitic and inexpedient at the present time.

The memorial was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of a law for compensation for French spoliation prior to 1800; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky. The resolutions were as follows:

1. Be it resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky deem a Bank of the United States, so constituted and organized as to secure to the nation the maintenance of a sound, wholesome, and convenient currency, indispensable to the prosperity of the country; and that the nation cannot dispense with such a Bank, without a certain prospect of private and public distress.

2. Be it further resolved, That the public lands of the United States are not, of right, the property of the particular States in which they lie, nor that of the people of such States; and therefore the Congress of the United States ought not to cede such lands to such States, or any of them, or to appropriate such lands for any purpose whatever, but in behalf and for the benefit of the people of all the States.

3. Resolved, further, That, in the opinion of this General Assembly, public policy requires, and the interests of the people will be greatly promoted, by a just and equitable distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the States respectively, according to Federal population.

4. Resolved, That copies of the foregoing resolutions be forwarded by the Governor to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, with a request that they will lay the same before each branch of the National Legislature.

Mr. CLAY said these resolutions were passed in one House by a unanimous vote, and in the other with but four dissentients, and expressed, he believed, the sentiments of nine-tenths of the people of the State.

On Mr. C's motion, the resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY also presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law that acted retrospectively, (which, in Mr. C's opinion, was the principal merit of a bankrupt law;) which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of Lewis Brown and other merchants of Philadelphia, praying the reimbursement of a portion of the duties paid by them on certain articles of hosiery; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of a number of citizens of Nantucket, for indemnity for French spoliation prior to 1800; which was laid on the table.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of Benjamin Brain, praying compensation for Revolutionary services; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of citizens of Baltimore, praying the passage of an appropriation for the erection of a fort on Soller's Point Flat; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the petition and papers of William Whitehead, now on file, were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of merchants and others remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law at the present session; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of citizens of New York, asking, if Congress deem it expedient to pass a bankrupt law, that banks and trading corporations may be included in its provisions; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of mechanics and laborers of New York, asking, if Congress pass a bankrupt law, that laborers and mechanics may be entitled to the benefit of its provisions; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of the Temperance Society of New York, praying that the spirit portion of the navy ration may be abolished; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Absalom Link, praying confirmation of his title to a tract of land.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of citizens of the State of Michigan, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. BENTON presented a letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing a communication from the Chief Engineer, on the creation of a company of sappers and miners; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. submitted the following resolution; which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of taking measures to settle and quiet the title of claimants to the Pea Patch island in the Delaware river.

Mr. WALL presented the memorial of the Marine Insurance Company of the city of New York, remonstrating against a repeal of the pilot law of 1837; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the memorial of citizens of Ohio, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. KING presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, praying the removal of the land office at Mardisville to a convenient location in the Cherokee purchase; which, as the subject has been passed upon by this body, was laid upon the table.

Mr. K. also presented resolutions of the same body, asking the passage of a law to authorize the adjustment of the claims of Alabama for money actually advanced by that State to aid in the prosecution of the Creek war; which, as a bill had been already reported, was laid on the table.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Twin; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. KING, the bill authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims of the State of Alabama was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and after explanation by Mr. K. it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, and having been read through, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States,

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Senate at much length in favor of the original bill.

Mr. MANGUM then obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. WALL, upon whose motion the Senate went into Executive session,

And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, January 25, 1841.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. CUSHING presented a memorial from C. T. James, of Newburyport, Massachusetts, upon the subject of steamboat explosions; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. W. JONES then moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceed to the special order.

Mr. BLACK inquired when the appeal which he had taken from the decision of the Chair, in reference to an Abolition petition, would be in order?

The CHAIR replied that it would be in order on the first petition day, unless some special order should interfere.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following communications, viz:

1. From the President of the United States, transmitting a report, with accompanying papers, from the Secretary of State, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 16th of December, calling for copies of all documents showing the origin of any political relations between the United States and the empire of China: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

9. From the President of the United States, as follows:

I transmit herewith to the House of Representatives of the United States a report from the Director of the Mint, exhibiting the operations of that institution during the year 1840, and I have to invite the special attention of Congress to that part of the Director's report in relation to the over-valuation given to the gold in foreign coins by the act of Congress of June 28, 1834, regulating the value of certain foreign gold coin within the United States.

Applications have been frequently made at the Mint, for copies of medals voted at different times by Congress to the officers who distinguished themselves in the war of the Revolution and in the last war, the dies for which are deposited in the Mint; and it is submitted to Congress whether authority shall be given to the Mint to strike off copies of those medals in bronze or other metal, to supply those persons making applications for them at a cost not to exceed the actual expense of striking them off.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 22d Jan. 1841.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, that part of the message which relates to the Mint was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and that which relates to medals, to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MARVIN obtained leave to present sundry petitions, (praying for a bankrupt law,) in behalf of his colleague, (Mr. CLARK,) who was confined to his room by indisposition.

The resolution offered by Mr. EVERETT on Friday coming up for consideration, Mr. E. said he would not press it, as it could now answer no useful purpose.

Mr. POPE asked leave to lay upon the table certain resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky.

Mr. CARR said he had the resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana on the subject of amending the Constitution of the United States, so as to restrict the eligibility of the President of the United States to a single term.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama moved that the rules be suspended one hour, for the purpose of presenting petitions and memorials which would not give rise to debate.

Mr. J. W. JONES again moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole; when

Mr. BANKS asked Mr. JONES to give way to enable him to submit a resolution; which, he said, would not occupy one moment. But

Mr. JONES persisting in his motion, The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. DUNCAN being entitled to the floor, announced that he should, in the course of the remarks he intended to make, take the liberty of answering various charges which gentlemen of the Opposition had thought proper to make against the Administration. Whether these charges had been made in order or not, he would not then undertake to decide; but as they had been made, whether in order or not, he considered it his right, nay, his imperative duty, to reply.

Mr. D. then proceeded to say that the whole history of nations and Governments satisfied him that never, since the establishment of civil institutions, had there existed a Government without two parties, one desirous for it to possess more power, and the other less. He then explained the nature of Monarchical, Aristocratical, and Republican forms of Government, the latter of which was the form under which we lived, and by which the people had the right to make, adjudicate and execute their law, either by themselves or by their Representatives.

In this Republican form of Government the people had a privilege, which was recognised by the Constitution, and which could not be wrested from them. That privilege was the right of instructing their Representatives to carry out their will. Therefore he contended when any Representative was elected, or officer of whatever character or description, if he was elected upon any question, or test, or measure, or principle, such officer or Representative was bound to carry out such question or measure in which he had been elected. Such was the bounden and sacred duty to the people who elected him. He was bound, by every principle of government and constitutional law, to support that measure for which he had been elected. And whenever any officer, whether the President or the humblest individual, had been thus elected, and failed to perform this duty, it was a gross breach of faith to the people.

After some further remarks on this head, Mr. D. said his object was to lead to the inquiry whether, at the recent election, any special instruction had been given by the people through the ballot boxes, whether in relation to this or the coming Administration.

Mr. D. then proceeded to notice the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the estimates furnished by that officer for the present year.

After reading the numerous items, Mr. D. said it would appear from the report of the Secretary that the estimated balance in the Treasury at the end of the present year, after making every payment, would be $824,273.

But the question had been asked, that as there was to be this balance in the Treasury at the close of the year, what necessity was there for the issue of these Treasury notes? His answer was, that a portion of the receipts referred to by the Secretary of the Treasury would not probably be paid in, such, for instance, as the item for the Bank of Natchez. But there was another reason, and that was the great inequality of receipts, and the inequality of the expenditures in the course of the year. It had been already shown, that, during the present quarter, a great amount became due before the funds for meeting the demands had been paid in. It therefore became necessary that a temporary provision should be made to enable the Treasury to anticipate for a short period its receipts. But let gentlemen wait until the end of the year, when the receipts and expenditures should be put together, and they would then see how much reason they had for their objections.

It might also be asked why such an amount of Treasury notes had been asked for in the bill. His answer was, that considering the great revolutions of trade, and the fluctuation of money matters, it was better to provide a sufficiency at once.

The Secretary of the Treasury informed them, that during the last year, the Treasury had met every demand which had been made upon it. Now some gentleman of the Opposition had thought proper to deny this, and to assert that the Government had been going on tick. He could, however, boldly assert that such had not been the case, and he felt assured that he could prove what he said to the satisfaction of the House.

Mr. D. then alluded to the charges made by Mr. BARNARD on this subject, and who had alleged that the work on the public buildings in this city had been suspended, and the payment of money due to the workmen postponed until the first of April next.

In order to be satisfied as to the truth of this charge, Mr. D. said he had addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, and a bill was read at the Clerk's table. The answer of the Secretary was also read, and stated in substance, that all the work done on the public buildings of this city, during the last year, to the best of his knowledge, had been paid for as soon as done. But the appropriation having been exhausted, as a matter of necessity during the present month, he believed the Committee on Public Building had received an application from some laborers to be permitted to go on with their work at their own risk, until a further appropriation should be made. The Board of Commissioners had not interfered in the case, and neither they nor the Department had proposed any reduction of wages.

Thus, said Mr. D. the appropriation having run out, the laborers themselves, at their own risk, during the present month, have made the application to be permitted to go on with the work. So much for the Government going on tick.

Mr. D. then gave a similar satisfactory explanation in reply to the objection raised in relation to the works at Old Point, both by Mr. BARNARD and Mr. WISE. After having read, at the Clerk's desk, a letter from the War Office on the subject, and which placed the matter in its proper light,

Mr. D. said it was thus he disposed of the objection of the gentleman from New York, who unfortunately had gone off half cocked. The gentleman from Virginia had also done the same, although, in a general way, he took fire before he went off.

Mr. D. then proceeded to reply to other objections raised by Mr. BARNARD in relation to the great amount alleged to be owing by the Government. He (Mr. D.) denied the correctness of the conclusions to which that and other members had come; and he desired to know if the Opposition fancied the people would be so foolish as to take their bare words, without facts or figures, against the facts and figures of the Secretary of the Treasury.

If there had been any expression at the ballot box against this mode of raising money by Treasury notes, he (Mr. D.) would acknowledge that it ought not to be done. So with a National Bank; and he would be the last man to support either against the will of the people. But he denied there had been any such expression against the measure contemplated by the bill, and that being the case, he considered it the duty of the Democratic party to carry out the principles by which they had so long been bound.

Mr. D. then proceeded to make some remarks as to the principles of the coming Administration, and the sacred duty of all officers, whether high or low, to act faithfully to the people who elected them.

In the course of his speech, Mr. D. alluded to the conduct of General Harrison and the course pursued by him at a certain meeting in Ohio. At that public meeting, said Mr. D. you find General Harrison telling the assembled thousands that he was opposed to a National Bank, on the ground that Congress has not constitutional power to incorporate it. But in the very same speech, and before the same assembled thousands, he tells them that if Congress should think proper to pass such a bill he would not veto it.

Now said Mr. D. look at this. Here on the 4th of March next, General Harrison will be sworn into office. He will lift up his hand and swear before God that he will faithfully support the Constitution. Yes, his lips will press the Holy Evangelists, and he will solemnly declare that the Constitution shall be preserved inviolate. And yet, according to his own words, should Congress see proper to pass a bill, which he believes to be unconstitutional, he will not veto it.

Mr. BOND here rose and desired to know what speech his colleague alluded.

Mr. DUNCAN was understood to say that he believed it was the speech at Cleveland.

Mr. BOND said he would undertake to say, that upon the Sub-Treasury bill, General Harrison had declared before the assembled multitude, that so far as he could he would have that measure repealed, because he was utterly opposed to it.

After some remarks from Mr. DUNCAN in reply, which were not distinctly heard—

Mr. BOND stated that he would undertake to say that General Harrison had not said he would not exercise the constitutional power of veto. But he had attested over and over again that he would hesitate before he exercised that power on a mere question of expediency. Mr. B. had never heard General Harrison say that he would relinquish the veto power upon what he believed to be against the Constitution. He (Mr. B.) believed that his colleague was mistaken when he said that Harrison had, at any time, failed to give an expression of his opinion to any public measure. He was above concealment; and if there was any man in the nation, whose heart was in his hand, it was William Henry Harrison.

Mr. DUNCAN. Yes, his heart is in both hands, or he has a heart in each hand, or that his heart has been in the hands of a Committee, as I will presently show.

Mr. BOND again asserted that General Harrison had never refused to give his opinion on any public measure.

Mr. DUNCAN wished to understand from the gentleman whether he meant to say that Harrison had ever answered through the newspaper columns.

Mr. BOND repeated that the General had no concealment.

Mr. DUNCAN. That is no answer to the question. I ask if General Harrison has ever thought proper to place his hand to any explanation in the newspapers.

Mr. BOND could not say whether the General had ever placed his hand to such explanation or not; but whenever he had been called on by letter, he had, Mr. B. believed, given an answer. It was not to be expected that he would answer every letter containing the same thing over and over again, but he had given an answer in a satisfactory way.

After some further conversation, which, owing to the disorder which prevailed, could not be reported with accuracy—Mr. DUNCAN asked Mr. BOND if he could furnish a single document signed by Harrison within the last year, either in relation to a United States Bank, Abolition, the assumption of State debts by the General Government, the distribution of the public lands, or any such important questions, and in which he, General Harrison, had given a final answer to such questions. Let the gentleman say yes or no.

Mr. BOND said that when he had such serious interrogatories propounded to him, he took it for granted that it was reasonable he should be allowed time to make a response.

Mr. DUNCAN finally proceeded with his remarks, in which he undertook to comment upon the military and other talents of General Harrison in a severe manner.

For this Mr. D. was called to order by members of the Opposition. He replied, that he would contrive to keep in order, but if he was to be called to order for holding up the military glories of Harrison, why were not other members called to order when they called Van Buren a jackass?

[The remarks of Mr. D. will be given hereafter in extenso.]

Without concluding, Mr. D. gave way for a motion that the committee rise.

On the question being taken, no quorum voted; and

The committee rose, and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. BEATTY moved that the House adjourn.

The yeas and nays were called for; but they were not ordered.

And then the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 26, 1841.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a memorial of citizens of Indiana, praying Congress to take measures for the recognition of the independence of Hayti, and the establishment of commercial relations with that Republic.

Mr. S. also presented a memorial of citizens of Indiana, praying such an amendment to the Constitution as to make white freemen the basis of representation.

The question of receiving these memorials, was, on motion by SEVIER, laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of D. W. Prescott, praying that the duty on certain goods destroyed by fire may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MERRICK presented the following memorial signed by a large number of the citizens of Washington:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned citizens of the United States, inhabitants of the city of Washington, beg leave respectfully to protest against the passage, in its present shape, of the bill now before the Senate, entitled "a bill to amend and continue in force the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington;" 1st. Because it proposes to give the right of suffrage to all persons, with no qualification other than a twelve month's residence, and with no protection against fraudulent voting by previous registry, and other sufficient safeguard: 2d. Because it proposes to make all persons eligible to the Mayoralty and to the Boards of Aldermen and Common Council, without any property qualification, or other stake or interest in the city than mere residence; thus, in an incorporation of property, placing the power of taxation, and the property of the fixed and permanent inhabitants of the city, at the disposal and mercy of those who have nothing themselves, and are often mere birds of passage: 3d. Because it proposes to submit the appointment of magistrates, and other police officers, to popular election, with no checks on them, no responsibility, no power of removal for misconduct or delinquency, and no corrective whatever of those conservators of the peace and order of the city, other than what is furnished by the said popular election: And because the said bill does not contain, as it ought, various powers and provisions which experience under the existing charter has shown to be necessary and proper for the better protection of property, and the better preservation of public order. For these reasons, (and for others which might be urged, but with which it is not necessary to trouble your honorable bodies, as these are insuperable and sufficient,) the undersigned respectfully pray that the said bill may not pass into a law, and that no other may be passed which has not the assent and concurrence of the people of Washington, for whose government the act is designed, and whose wishes, it is presumed, ought therefore to be consulted.

The memorial was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Andrew J. Johnson and Samuel M. Love; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. LINN, the bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to amend an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land under the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians," was taken up, and recommended to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Prince Georges county, Maryland, engaged in the planting and cultivation of tobacco, praying the adoption of measures by the General Government for the purpose of relieving their staple from the burdensome duties imposed in foreign countries.

Mr. M. accompanied the presentation of the memorial with some remarks, which were replied to by Mr. CALHOUN, when, without taking the question on its reference, the Senate passed to the consideration of the special order—the

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log-cabin thereon, was taken up, and having been read through, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. MANGUM addressed the Senate at much length in opposition to the bill, and in favor of the recommitment.

Mr. BENTON followed, confining his remarks principally to the establishment of the fact of foreign interference in the recent Presidential election.

Mr. TALLMADGE replied, and on motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, January 26, 1841.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, on leave, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a bill to repeal so much of the act entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved July 14, 1833, as exempts pins of foreign manufacture from the payment of duties; and proposes to subject them, when imported, after the first day of April next, to a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem.

The bill was read a first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. POPE asked the consent of the House to present the resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, on the subject of the public lands, etc. that they might lie on the table, and be printed.

Objection being made,

Mr. POPE moved to suspend the rules for that purpose; but the motion was negative.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of five millions of

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. DUNCAN being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday in favor of the bill, and in reply to the numerous charges of the opposition against the financial policy of the Administration. With this view, he took a review of the corrupt transactions of the United States Bank, and showed how far its supporters were qualified to act as judges against the present party in power.

Mr. D. then at some length went into an examination of the banking system in general, and the exclusive privileges and superior advantages which such incorporated institutions possessed over individuals. He denied that the banking system was the offspring of the Democratic party, and in proof thereof referred to the vote taken at the last session on the bill for re-chartering the District Banks. The record would show that the Democratic party in the House refused to grant a renewal of the charters with the usual privileges, unless those banks would first pay their debts.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. D. intimated that by way of illustrating his arguments in relation to the Whigs, he had taken the liberty of calling upon his poet.

Several members desired that the poetry might be read.

Mr. DUNCAN said no, it would not do; for were he to attempt to read it there, he would be called to order. Besides, the poetry was to be sung.

A member desired to know if it would be in order to have the poetry sung. If so, he should desire it.

Mr. DUNCAN could not oblige the gentleman; but they would see the poetry in print, when his remarks were published. But he had no objection to inform them that the poetry was set to the tune Roslin Castle.

Before concluding, Mr. D. adverted to a letter from Mr. Kelly, which appeared in the National Intelligencer some time ago, denying that General Harrison had refused to give pledges, etc. Mr. D. produced evidence from an authentic source, showing that the statements of said letter were not true, all which will be given when the speech shall be published in full.

"When Mr. DUNCAN had finished his remarks, he read from the Intelligencer the following, as reported in that paper:

"Mr. W. C. JOHNSON submitted to the Chair whether it was in order for an individual to charge General Harrison with cowardice, who had himself been branded as a coward on this floor?"

"This paper was put in his hand a moment before he commenced speaking. He had deferred saying any thing on the subject until he should finish his remarks, expecting that some denial would be made, or some correction of the report ordered. But that not being done, he denounced its author (pointing to Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,) a base liar, a contemptible puppy, a scoundrel, and an infamous coward. Now, sir, said Mr. D. I heard no part of the matter so reported, as applied to myself; and I ask the chairman, who was nearer to Mr. JOHNSON, whether or not he heard the member so express himself?"

"The chairman [Mr. CAMPBELL] responded that he heard no such remark.

"Then, said Mr. D. if said at all it must have been muttered, and not intended to be heard.

"Mr. JOHNSON rose and said he was correctly reported. He had made the remark, and justified it. He read a part of a speech which purported to have been delivered in support of the resolution which had been introduced to expel Mr. D. for the publication of certain letters, posing certain members therein named. Mr. J. made some other remarks in justification.

"Mr. DUNCAN said that resolution and its support was founded in base cowardice. It was manufactured, as he was informed, and had reason to believe, in a caucus; and the object was to relieve the members posted in the said letters from disgrace, which they had not the courage to relieve themselves from. When the resolution was introduced, it was intimated that the publication of these letters was postponed until after the passage of the law against dueling. As soon as that intimation was uttered, Mr. D. said he pronounced the man who imputed such a motive to him, a base scoundrel and a liar. The member from Kentucky, [Mr. MENNIEP] intimated the same; he, too, said Mr. D. I pointed out instantly, and pronounced a contemptible scoundrel, and told him that the duelling law only operated over ten miles square; and in ten or twelve short days we would be out of these ten miles square, and any gentleman who felt himself aggrieved, might call on him: he should be met, and have such redress as he might have the courage to ask. Mr. D. disclaimed having charged General Harrison with cowardice, in any remark he had made; he had presented no fact or statement but what the political history of the country and of the last war warranted and sustained. Those who heard him, and those who might read him, could draw their own conclusions. And to conclude, once for all, said Mr. D. I repeat and fix upon the member [Mr. JOHNSON] the charge I made upon him. He is welcome to make the best of it."

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky next obtained the floor, and went into an examination of the estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury; contending that, at the close of 1841, there would be a deficit of ten millions of dollars, and that it was the duty of Congress to make more ample provision for the present year than had yet been proposed. Mr. D. spoke at some length in favor of fortifying the country, and increasing the strength of the navy, &c. and concluded by expressing his that the amendment of Mr. BARNARD (to tax wines, silks, etc.) was the best means yet proposed for raising the necessary revenue to carry on the operations of the Government for the present year.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. CRABBE, on leave, presented the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, protesting against the revival of a protective tariff; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. C. also asked leave to present a memorial having reference to claims for military services.

But objection being made,

Mr. C. moved to suspend the rules.

Pending which motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting fifty-two copies of the official Army Register in compliance with the resolution of the 13th December, 1815; which was read.

Mr. WALKER submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the claim of the village of Carondelet, in Missouri, to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of a number of the inhabitants of Noxubee county, Mississippi, praying that the right of pre-emption to a tract of land may be extended to Christopher Nations, a settler on the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of a number of the citizens of Natchez, Mississippi, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Maine, praying that the fishing bounties and allowances may not be discontinued; which, with former memorials on the subject, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Hannah Page, widow of a Revolutionary soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Philadelphia, praying the erection of a new custom-house at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, praying the erection of a light house on Brandywine Shoal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PORTER presented the petition of a number of citizens of St. Clair county, Michigan, for a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. SEVIER presented the memorial of the General Assembly of Arkansas, asking an appropriation for completing the military road from Memphis to Little Rock; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FULTON presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, praying an appropriation for completing the road from Helena to Cache; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. F. also presented a memorial of the same body, asking a donation of land to aid the White River Turnpike Company; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of James Allen, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, directors of an association called the New England Mississippi Land Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims of the State of Alabama; and

The bill directing sets of the standard weights and measures to be placed in the War Department; were severally read a third time, and passed.

The memorial of a number of citizens of Prince Georges county, Maryland, engaged in the planting and cultivation of tobacco, praying the adoption of measures by the General Government for the purpose of relieving their staple from the burdensome duties imposed in foreign countries, which was not disposed of yesterday, was taken up, and Mr. MERRICK replied at considerable length to Mr. CALHOUN's remarks yesterday. He was briefly replied to by Mr. CALHOUN, who was followed in the debate by Messrs. LINN and PRESTON; when, without coming to a conclusion, on motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, the

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log-cabin thereon, was taken up, the question being on the motion of Mr. CARRITTENDEN to re-commit the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he rose to make but a very few remarks. As usual, he felt indisposed to address the Senate, wherever his views were presented by others; but upon the present occasion, he considered it his duty to speak briefly for himself. The subject had, in its progress, assumed a magnitude, and gathered around it an importance, rarely equalled on the floor of the Senate. The original proposition or bill, which gave rise to this discussion, provided, and was simply intended to secure to actual and humble settlers on the public lands, the right of pre-emption to one hundred and sixty acres of the public land, at the Government price of $1 25 per acre. But the various topics of discussion introduced here, had embraced almost the entire range of party measures, and party politics, known to our country. For himself, he had neither taste or disposition to enter upon a partisan controversy on the floor of the Senate. Ripe years, and an abiding sense of the dignity of the station which he had the honor to occupy, forbade his entering on a course which might change the appropriate sphere of the Senator into that of the mere partisan. If he felt himself prepared to enter upon the discussion of all the subjects brought into this debate, he should certainly at this time forbear from doing so. He felt none of that spirit of party triumph which we have seen exhibited more than once in this chamber, since the commencement of the present session. No, sir, (said Mr. L.) taking the late elections for a test, I am in the minority in my own State, and in the Union. Well, if the people will it, be it so. But if he was in a majority, he would sound no shouts of triumph here; he would wear his honors with becoming modesty.

Since the commencement of the present session, an honorable Senator expressed the opinion that he considered the Senators from nineteen States instructed to vote for the repeal of the Independent Treasury. I suppose, sir, (said Mr. L.) I am one of the Senators included in this count, and therefore he would take that occasion to state, that he had no special instructions whatever. His instructions were embraced in those general obligations which devolve on every Senator. His opinions remained unchanged upon the subject of the Independent Treasury, and every other important measure which had agitated the country for several years past. And he would add, that he believed a majority of the people of Georgia this day concurred with him upon all these important measures. True, a majority had not concurred with him in selecting men for office. A majority of the late Legislature of Georgia were the supporters of General Harrison for the Presidency. Why did they not instruct him (Mr. L.) to vote for the repeal of the Independent Treasury, and for the establishment of a National Bank? Such resolutions were introduced into the Legislature of Georgia, but prudence was considered the better part of valor. The Harrison party, though in a majority, feared to pass them. Therefore, he hoped it would hereafter be understood that he was unnumbered with any special instructions from his immediate constituent body, or from the people of Georgia. Sir, (said Mr. L.) I verily believe, this day a large majority of the people of Georgia concur with me in regard to the public measures and policy of the country—while they have differed with me in the selection of the man to carry out these measures and policy. The short time I remain here, my course upon all great measures will remain unchanged, and I shall return to my constituents with a full confidence that I have represented the wishes of a very large majority of them.

As he had already intimated, he would not detain the Senate by entering upon any one of the great questions which have incidentally grown out of the discussion of the policy of the pre-emption bill. His views had been presented by different Senators, with whom he had voted upon these several subjects, and consequently he should not travel over the same ground.

He would only say, in conclusion, that he had always thought, and still thought, that the best possible disposition which could be made of the public domain was for the Government to sell it, at a fair price, to actual settlers, in small quantities—in quantities suited to the wants and abilities of the settlers. He had long since been disgusted with the auction system; he had witnessed the operations of that system. It secured to capitalists, moneyed combinations, and speculators, the whole of the best lands, to the exclusion of honest, humble industry. He was pleased with the prospective character of this pre-emption bill. It was a call to the poor and needy, but industrious and enterprising, from every part of the country, to go forward, cultivate, work, multiply, and replenish the earth.

Sir, (said Mr. L.) I would not only open the door to male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age, but to male and female over and under twenty-one years of age; and neither would he require that they should be naturalized citizens. Actual bona fide settlement and improvement is all that he would require, in addition to the prompt payment of the Government price for a small piece of land. This policy would benefit the Government, as well as administer to the wants of humanity. It provides for the poor and the needy, who are willing to work and cultivate the soil, whether male or female, naturalized citizen or foreigner. He had no apprehensions of evil consequences from the husbandman. No, sir, (said Mr. L.) this fertile, this highly favored land, has no evil to apprehend from the tiller of the soil. Agricultural pursuits, properly conducted, never fail to make the best of citizens. His only hope for the permanent prosperity of this country was based upon the virtue, intelligence, and industry of our agricultural population.

Mr. ANDERSON briefly replied to some of the remarks of Mr. MANGUM yesterday.

Mr. WRIGHT then took the floor, and spoke until nearly 4 o'clock in opposition to the distribution policy; when, without concluding, he yielded to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1841.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the motion made by Mr. CRABB on yesterday to suspend the rules, to enable him to present a memorial; pending which motion the House had adjourned.

The question was taken and decided in the affirmative; and

Mr. CRABB presented the memorial and resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, claiming reimbursement for certain large advances made by her in carrying on the late war with the Creek Indians in Alabama; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EASTMAN, on leave, presented additional evidence in the case of Mark Burnham; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. POPE being entitled to the floor, said his real object in obtaining the floor, was to advise his Whig friends not to make any further delay in the passage of the bill. It had been conceded by all that the bill ought to pass, and he therefore saw no necessity for discussing subjects which had been debated on every stump for the last four years. Mr. P. observed that they had a great deal of private and other business to act upon at the present session, and he therefore suggested whether it would not, for the present, be best to have a cessation of hostilities on party questions, and take the question at once on the passage of the bill.

Several members here said, "agreed," "agreed."

But Mr. WISE and other Opposition members intimating that they would claim their right to address the committee,

Mr. POPE said as that was the case, and his Whig friends persisted in continuing the debate, he had no alternative but to proceed.

Mr. P. then took a review of the means reported by the Secretary of the Treasury for meeting the demands against the Government for the present year, and contended that the calculations had been made without sufficient data. He then gave, in detail, his views as to the real amount that was to be expected from the customs, the public lands, and other sources referred to by the Secretary in his report.

In speaking of the tariff question, Mr. P. gave it as his opinion that before long the States of the South themselves would be in favor of a protective tariff on tobacco and other articles raised in the South. He referred to a memorial, now on their tables, from the Tobacco Convention, asking for the protection of that interest, and in which convention were men from Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky.

Mr. P. was opposed to the reduction of any of the expenditures for the navy or other public works

He reviewed the growing power of England, her daring ambition, the increase of her navy by steam ships, etc. and contended that our only means of securing ourselves was to make liberal appropriations for the erection of steam batteries, and the increase of our naval power. In his opinion, the only effectual way in which we could speak to England, would be through our guns.

As for British gold, and British influence, the only way to counteract that was to arm ourselves with a sound currency.

Mr. P. then at some length urged that the only mode of obtaining a sound currency was the re-establishment of a National Bank.

He then went on to tell how the coming Administration would put all those matters to rights, and how the currency, under their guidance, would be firm, stable, and not liable to depreciation.

He also gave his views in relation to log cabins and log cabin policy, as connected with the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. He contended that any policy which screwed the money out of the pockets of the laboring man, was a bad policy. He desired that the road to a home in the Western wilderness might be still kept open for the poor. He maintained that a great portion of the Western lands was scarcely worth any thing, and the gentlemen who imagined they were giving away the public lands by selling them at a dollar and a quarter an acre, were much mistaken. The fact was, that in many cases the land was not worth that price. He therefore objected against any system which would increase the price.

He took the ground that the General Government ought not to look upon the Western lands as a source of revenue, and it was in this view that he was in favor of a distribution.

After speaking for two hours, Mr. P. said he was exhausted, and would now give way to his friend, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who ought not to complain of his having occupied so much time; for he, (Mr. P.) had once sat and listened patiently to a four hours' speech of the gentleman, when scarcely any body else remained in the House.

Mr. WISE then took the floor, but gave way to

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON, who desired to make a statement in relation to certain remarks of Mr. DUNCAN in the Globe of last evening. (Mr. DUNCAN at this time was not in his seat.)

Mr. J. then read the following extract from House report of yesterday:

"But that not being done, he denounced its author (pointing to Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON) a base liar, a contemptible puppy, a scoundrel and an infamous coward."

Now he Mr. J. wished to say that this language imputed by the Globe to the member from Ohio was not used by him, as every gentleman in the House could testify. The statement was entirely false. After some further remarks in relation to the principles which influenced his own conduct, Mr. J. concluded by repeating that the language put in the Globe was not used by the gentleman from Ohio, and there was no gentleman of any party in the House who would rise and say that it was used.

[The Reporter, as an act of justice to himself, states that he is in no way responsible for that portion of the report disclaimed by Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. WISE regretted that, on this occasion, he felt compelled to take the floor, being physically unfit to talk for two or three hours on the bill under consideration. If his friends had chosen to vote in silence, without condemning the vote which he intended to give, he would gladly have said nothing. He would, too, much rather have preferred, before the debate arose on this question, that his friends should have met together as brothers, and reconciled their differences; and regretted exceedingly to differ from any one of them. They had advanced opinions not only for themselves, but for their party; and had taken upon themselves to advance opinions on this question from which he was obliged to dissent. Whether they would be the opinions of the coming Administration, remained to be seen. But he notified gentlemen that, as far as his voice was heard—in the House, in the forum, on the floor of Congress—wherever he had any influence—he disclaimed speaking for the coming Administration. If some of his friends had differed from him, they must not complain if he should express opinions different from theirs—especially must they not complain when no two of them had agreed with each other; for, if what they said was true, we should indeed should have a motley policy.

Mr. W. said, from the signs of the times now before him, he intended to vote for the bill under consideration, to which he intended to offer an amendment. He had heretofore voted against the issue of Treasury notes; because it was too easy a means for raising funds to carry on the Government, and because it was difficult to convince the people that it was a public debt. He conceded the constitutional power, but thought it ought to be used only in cases of great emergency. To be candid and plain, he would vote for the bill for the reasons, first, as a friend of the coming Administration, to provide it with the means to carry on the Government after the 4th of March; secondly, because it was the best means to prevent a called session of Congress; thirdly, to prevent, during the year 1841, the premature revision of the compromise act, or tariff; and at the same time prevent the seizure of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for distribution.

Mr. W. noticed a letter, published recently in the Richmond Enquirer, under date of Washington, January 14, 1841, in which it was intimated that Mr. Wise was disaffected towards the coming Administration, which assertion Mr. W. pronounced an infamous slander, whether coming from friend or foe.

After speaking of the various parties which had united to defeat the present Administration, Mr. W. avowed himself a plain Republican of the Madison school, and warned his friends in the House that he would go with them as far as he could, but told them to mark that he should contend for Republican tenets and Republican policy. One of the Republican tenets which he would exact was, General Harrison shall not be ruled by a party; if he should, the country would be misruled; for the election of General Harrison was not a party triumph, but a glorious national triumph, and it was the duty of the President elect to be the President of the nation and not of a party, &c.

Mr. W. was understood to contend for an issue of five millions of Treasury notes after the 31st of March; in short, that the coming Administration might enjoy the same benefit under the bill now before the committee as the present Administration possessed under the act of 1840.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said he would take the occasion to state that it was not expected by the Secretary of the Treasury that more than one million of dollars would be used before the 4th of March; the greater proportion of which would be required to pay pensions which will fall due after the 31 of March. It will not, therefore, be required to meet liabilities falling upon this Administration, but upon that which is to succeed it; so that General Harrison's administration will have the full benefit of five millions of dollars for one year after the 31 of March. A similar bill was deemed necessary for the present administration under like circumstances at the commencement of the last year; and Mr. J. considered it just and proper now to make a similar provision.

Mr. WISE, without concluding his remarks gave way for a motion that the committee rise and

The committee then rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. EASTMAN gave notice that he would tomorrow, or as soon thereafter as it might be in order, ask leave to introduce a bill to extend for five years the act entitled an act granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows, approved July 7, 1838.

Mr. BOARDMAN, on leave, introduced the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to this House an abstract of the returns of the marshal of the District of Connecticut, showing the number of slaves within the said district a by the census of 1840. And to ascertain and report to this House whether the captives taken from the schooner Amistad were included in the number of slaves.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a message from the President of the United States, transmitting the twelfth annual report of the Board of Inspectors of the Penitentiary of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a resolution of the General Assembly of his State, instructing their Senators and Representatives "to procure, if possible, by their exertions, at as early a day as may be in their power, a repeal of a bill passed at the last session of Congress, known as the Independent Treasury bill; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented a report and resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, in relation to the controversy between the States of Georgia and Maine, growing out of the refusal of the latter State to deliver certain fugitives from justice who fled from punishment for offences committed within the jurisdiction of Georgia; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he had formerly introduced a bill on the subject of copy-right, which he would have again presented but from the apprehension there was little prospect of its passage at the present session. He would give notice, however, that if he was a member of the body the next session, he would take an early opportunity of pressing the matter upon the attention of the Senate.

The bill was then referred.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the Committee on Pensions were instructed to inquire into the propriety of granting a pension to Daniel Peck for disabilities incurred during the last war, while the line of his duty.

Mr. WRIGHT resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the distribution policy.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky took the floor at 6 o'clock, and, without concluding, at half past gave way to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, January 28, 1841.

Mr. HOLMES asked leave to offer a resolution that so much of the report of the Secretary of Treasury as proposes the rebuilding of the arsenal at Charleston, South Carolina, be referred to Committee on Military Affairs.

Objection being made,

Mr. HOLMES moved to suspend the rules; the motion was negatived.

An act to confirm claims to lands in the district between the Rio Grande and Sabine rivers.

An act for the relief of Charles Morgan, of Louisiana.

An act for the relief of Charles Morgan.

An act confirming certain land claims in Louisiana.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES of Virginia, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of five millions of

TREASURY NOTES.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. BARNARD to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. WISE being entitled to the floor, was about to resume his remarks from yesterday, when he gave way to

Mr. DUNCAN, who said that in the Globe of yesterday morning, which he held in his hand, was the following report:

"When Mr. DUNCAN had finished his remarks, he read from the Intelligencer the following, as reported in that paper:

"Mr. W. C. JOHNSON submitted to the Chair whether it was in order for an individual to charge General Harrison with cowardice, who had himself been branded as a coward on this floor?"

"This paper was put in his hand a moment before he commenced speaking. He had deferred saying any thing on the subject until he should finish his remarks, excepting that some denial would be made, or some correction of the report ordered. But that not being done, he denounced its author (pointing to Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,) a base liar, a contemptible puppy, a soundrel, and an infamous coward."

After reading the above, Mr. DUNCAN proceeded to say that in the Intelligencer of this morning he was astonished to see a positive denial that he had used the offensive language in question to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] Mr. D. then stated that he did use every word of the language. There was, however, one word in it which he was not quite certain he used, viz: the word "puppy." He was not quite certain that he used that word, but a member now near him was confident that the word was used in connection with the others. But he, Mr. D. did use the words; it was a correct report and he could prove it.

Mr. D. was not disposed now to make a new issue out of the matter, but when it came to scanning the character of gentlemen here, he might present some facts which should set them fair before the public.

Mr. D. continued, that he merely rose to assert that the language denied by the gentleman from Maryland was used, and he now reiterated it; yes, every word of it he reiterated.

Mr. D. then disclaimed any knowledge of the technicalities of the duello, but trusted that whenever occasion should call, he would not be deficient in courage to meet the man who gave him cause.

Mr. D. repeated that he used every word of the language attributed to him in the report of the Globe, and that he should publish it and put his name to it, as having been used, and reiterated. He would take this opportunity of saying that he would trouble the committee no more with this matter, as he had said all he intended to say. If he should have occasion to take any further notice of the matter, it should be done out of the House, when he would address the public through the columns of the newspapers. He would be heard there and read by the people.

Mr. D. said that he would further remark, that the duelling law of this District had as little terror for him as it appeared to have to others. The member from Maryland might rest assured that he would have nothing to fear from him (Mr. D.) in relation to that law.

After an ineffectual attempt by Mr. STANLY to obtain the floor,

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON sent to the Clerk's table a letter, which the Reporter to this paper had addressed to him, stating that the remarks of Mr. DUNCAN were revised by that gentleman previous to their going to press. [The unmerited censure cast upon the Reporter by several members, induced him to take that step.]

The letter having been read,

Mr. JOHNSON proceeded to make some brief retaliatory remarks, in which he contended that Mr. DUNCAN had not relieved himself from the charge.

Mr. DUNCAN said that the remarks in the Globe were precisely what he said.

Mr. WISE said he would never again yield the floor for the purpose of allowing gentlemen to indulge in personalities, and alluded to the passage of a certain law of Congress, and the predictions he then made in regard to it—the fruits of which the House were daily witnessing. He again referred to the letter in the Richmond Equiter, speaking of his opposition to W. C. RIVES. Although Mr. W's personal feelings in this matter remained unchanged, he was, nevertheless, glad that Mr. R. was sent back to the Senate of the United States, and hoped he would pursue the Republican tack of his great patron, Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. W. recapitulated his reasons why he would vote for the Treasury note bill; one of which was that it would banish all excuses for a called session. If one should be called, nothing would be done; the country would be dissatisfied, and the Administration blamed. This was the case in 1837, when two months were consumed in debate, and nothing was done; and if an extra session were to be called in 1841, the country would be left where it was, except subjected to some additional expense of two or three hundred thousand dollars.

After urging further objections against an extra session, Mr. W. said he hoped the majority in the House would leave the Whigs the means to carry on the Government until December next, and let them go home and consult with their constituents on the very important measures which he feared would be prematurely brought forward at a called session; wait the development of events; wait to see the importations of the country, and not anticipate them; go home and feel the pulse of the people on the subject of a bank, the public lands, &c.

Mr. W. said he was called on to do that which he never expected to do on God's earth, and gentlemen must not smile when he had to praise a report of Levi Woodbury! At all events it was an able paper; from the Nazarene, from whom he never expected any good. Every gentleman, of all sides, did justice to the report, made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 16th inst. calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to the Senate the plan of a permanent change in the tariff, and its details and general principles. Mr. W. remarked that gentlemen would find his sentiments precisely in the report of the Secretary, for which he humbly and respectfully thanked him.

Mr. W. spoke at some length in regard to the compromise act and other subjects connected with the revenue; but, without concluding, gave way for a motion that the committee rise.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. PROFFIT moved that the House again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, and take up the bill confirming to the State of Indiana a grant of land on the Wabash and Erie canal.

Objection being made.

Mr. PROFFIT moved a suspension of the rules but no quorum voted, and

The House then adjourned.

Mr. BLAIR will please publish the annexed note of Mr. Hunt, (your Reporter,) which I herewith enclose you. I send it as an offset to the note upon which Mr. JOHNSON relied to prove that I did not denounce him as reported in last Wednesday's Globe. The enclosed note will show what Mr. Hunt remembers of the language used towards Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Hunt was right in disclaiming responsibility. I revised his notes as reported, and inserted what he neglected or forgot to insert. I made the report correspond with what I said.

A. DUNCAN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

January 29, 1841.

SIR: Having, as an act of justice to myself, addressed a letter to the Hon. W. C. JOHNSON, stating that certain reported proceedings in the "Globe" were revised by you, at your request, I now state the language I understood you to use to that gentleman, and which would have appeared in the report had it not been revised.

In the first place you read from the National Intelligencer the following:

"Mr. W. C. JOHNSON submitted to the Chair whether it was in order for an individual to charge General Harrison with cowardice, who had himself been branded as a coward on this floor."

After expressing your astonishment at the above, and stating that you heard no such remarks, you turned towards Mr. JOHNSON, and said, in substance, that "if the language was used, you had no hesitation in denouncing the man who uttered it as guilty of a base falsehood, and an infamous liar."

I did not hear the terms "contemptible puppy," "soundrel," and "infamous coward," as applied to Mr. JOHNSON, but understood them as having reference to what you stated had taken place between yourself and Mr. Menefee, on a former occasion.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. HUNT, Reporter to the Globe.

Hon. ALEXANDER DUNCAN.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 29, 1841.

Mr. WHITE presented resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of holding the Presidential election on the same day throughout the Union; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. WHITE also presented resolutions of the same body in favor of the creation of a National Bank. Mr. W. gave his views on the subject at considerable length, expressing himself strongly in favor of the measure recommended, and his confidence that the Administration about coming into power would do its duty in regard to it. The resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented a petition of citizens of Michigan in favor of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a petition of citizens of Utica, N. Y. for the passage of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of E. W. and H. Smith; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GRAHAM, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill directing a survey to ascertain the practicability and expense of constructing a passage from Albatraz Sound to the Atlantic Ocean; which, after some remarks from Mr. G. was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of Greene and Emerson was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and, after being explained by Mr. H. was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. KING, the bill increasing the pay of certain officers of revenue cutters, while serving in the navy of the United States, was taken up, and, after some remarks from Mr. K. and Mr. LINN, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW:

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommit the bill with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky having concluded his remarks,

Mr. TAPPAN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Before I proceed to remark upon the extraordinary attack made by the Senator from Kentucky upon my colleague and myself, I wish to ask that Senator who it is that he charges with "having made a proposition to reduce wages."

Mr. CLAY said he did not mean to be understood as saying that any one had made such a proposition.

Mr. TAPPAN. Such is the language you used, sir.

Mr. CLAY. I did not intend to charge any one with more than sustaining in argument a policy, the inevitable tendency of which would be to reduce wages; and this was done by many gentlemen whom I do not think I am called upon to name. I do not recollect using the word proposition.

Mr. TAPPAN. I am satisfied, sir, with this explanation; the Senator's construction of arguments made by others does not affect me. The Senator from Kentucky on yesterday charged my colleague and myself with voting for a proposition, the effect of which would be to give away 160,000,000 of acres of land, justly belonging to Ohio, for 800,000 acres, and ordered us to go home and account to our constituents for this gross sacrifice of the interests of Ohio. This charge of the Senator is not founded in truth, as I shall show; but let me not be misunderstood. I do not say that the Senator has intentionally stated a falsehood on this floor; he would not do this, and yet it is strange that he, or any other less experienced legislator, should so misconceive our vote on that occasion as he seems to have done. The case was this: the Senator's colleague [Mr. CRITTENDEN] had moved to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert what has gained the name of "Mr. CLAY's land bill," upon which the Senator from South Carolina nearest to me [Mr. CALHOUN] moved to amend the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, by substituting his [Mr. CALHOUN's] bill for disposing of the public lands to the States, so that if the motion to recommit should prevail, the plan of the Senator from South Carolina should be reported back to us instead of the Kentucky Senator's bill. Now, who does not see that the question here, was not whether we should agree to adopt either of those projects; but it was a mere question of preference, and surely an opinion may be given in good faith, that of two plans, one is better than another without any intention of adopting either. Such was this case; of the two plans, I preferred the one offered by the Senator from South Carolina, and so voted, not with a view of expressing any approbation of the plan proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, but to defeat the motion to refer with instructions made by the Senator from Kentucky on my right. These are the views in which my colleague and myself concur, as was expressed by him on yesterday, in his reply to the remark of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY:] and I think if the question should ever again come up while I have the honor of a seat here, I shall continue to give the same preference, notwithstanding the denunciation of the Senator from Kentucky. I give no opinion upon the abstract merits of the plan proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, because it is not and has not been before us on the final question of adopting it; but I will say that I am not inclined to make important changes in our land system; that system has heretofore worked well, and I see no necessity for a radical change of it. Sir, the Senator charges us upon this side with "opposing in advance the measures of the next Administration"—with making war upon it; and he quotes Shakspeare, "Come on McDuff," as though we were actually in battle array against him. We have opposed the Senator's unconstitutional project for distributing amongst the several States the revenue arising from the public lands, and Senators upon this side have given as their opinion, and have demonstrated, that a special session of Congress will not be necessary. We have been told by Senators on the opposite side that these things, with some others, would be supported by the next Administration. We have seen and heard the Senator from Kentucky when he has assured us that his land bill (as he calls it) "would pass" when that gentleman and his friends came into power; that unless we repealed the Independent Treasury bill, the next Administration would call an extra session of Congress to repeal it. We have also heard the Senator describe, in his graphic way, how the next Administration would make a clear sweep of all office holders, with probably no exceptions; but we have been ignorant of the Senator's authority to pronounce ex-cathedra upon the course to be pursued by General Harrison; and for myself, I confess that having some knowledge of General Harrison, I had my doubts whether he was to be governed, dictated to, and led by the nose by the honorable Senator, as he seemed to promise us. He exhibited to us no authority for the assumption of the dictatorship. If the Harrisburg Convention, in nominating one of the gentlemen and rejecting the other, did secretly determine that while one should be viceroy over the good people of these United States, the other should be viceroy over him, how were we to know that important fact? You gave us no evidence of this. We are excusable then, I should think, for opposing such measures as the Senator's land bill, which we think unconstitutional, without being chargeable with anticipated hostility to the next Administration.

But the Senator bids us go home! and account to our constituents for our conduct here. Go home! We obey no such orders. We submit to no such dictation. Who gave the Senator from Kentucky authority over us? Autocrat of Kentucky, let him issue his orders there to his obsequious slaves; but with Ohio and her representatives he has nothing to do. Sir, I repeat with scorn this matchless insolence.

Here Mr. CLAY called Mr. TAPPAN to order, and he sat down.

The VICE PRESIDENT, after some remarks, which we did not hear distinctly, said that it was out of order to use the word insolence in the way Mr. TAPPAN had used it.

Mr. TAPPAN rose, and continued. Sir, I will repel insolence and insult, come from what quarter they may.

Mr. CLAY then rose and declared that in what he had said, he had not the remotest intention of insulting the Senators from Ohio; that in using the words, go home, &c. he meant no more than to advise those Senators to consult their constituents on their return home as to their wishes upon this great question of disposing of the public lands.

Mr. TAPPAN then observed: The Senator's explanation is satisfactory. From the vehemence of his manner, and the loudness of his intonation, I thought the Senator in earnest, and that he meant what he said. It seems that in this I was mistaken. I therefore let that pass; I will not knowingly treat any Senator with disrespect; my age and my habits lead me to a courteous demeanor towards all with whom I have business to transact, and I will not willingly deviate from this course; but insolence and insult I shall not put up with, and I am glad to find that on this occasion nothing of that nature was intended.

Mr. President, having disposed of this matter, (without intending to engage at large in this debate, so protracted and interesting,) I will express my views on one or two points only. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] read to us the first paragraph of the 8th section, 1st article, of the Constitution: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States;" and gave us his opinion that this taxing power did not authorize Congress to raise money for distribution amongst the States. I coincide fully with the Senator in this opinion, but does he not perceive that by this sound construction of the Constitution, he concedes to us the whole matter in controversy as to his land bill? I know how the Senator thinks to get this power: it is not in this clause, indeed, but he tells us it is contained in these words:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

From the grant of power to dispose of the land, he infers the power to dispose of the proceeds of the land. Congress have, indeed, by this clause, the power to dispose of the public land for the benefit of the United States; and it is under this clause alone that the constitutionality of all the grants of public lands which have been made to the individual States, can be maintained. If we admit (which I do not, however) that by this clause in the Constitution, Congress has the unlimited power to do whatever it pleases with the territory of the United States—that it may grant the whole or any part to some or all of the States, that it may give it away to actual settlers; or, that it may sell and dispose of it for money, making it an object of revenue; still, Congress cannot raise revenue for the purpose of distribution. The public lands are sold for money. A part of the revenues of this Government are derived from that source. It matters not whether you raise your revenue from the customs, from the sale of your ships, from a tax on land, or the sale of your land; when that revenue reaches the public Treasury, there is no ear-mark on it to distinguish the quarter from which it came. It is the money of the nation, to be used for national purposes. If there is any clause in the Constitution which gives you authority to make a distribution of it amongst the States, it is the clause first quoted; but this, says the Senator, and so say I, contains no such power. Congress is not required by the Constitution to sell the public lands to make the territory of the Union an object of revenue. The manner of disposing of that territory is no where expressed. It is implied only that Congress shall dispose of it for the benefit of the whole, and not select part of the Union. Congress have thought best to sell their land for money; have for more than forty years thought that to raise a part of their ordinary revenues by thus disposing of it, was to execute their power of disposing of it in the manner best calculated to promote the interest of the nation. I will not argue the question whether it might not have been as well to have authorized Congress to make a division by the States or otherwise of the money received for land, for we are not making a Constitution; but I will say that a power to grant or sell land does not carry with it the power to dispose of the money received for such land—when the land is sold, the power to dispose of it is executed; for the power to dispose of the money you must look elsewhere.

As to the bill before the Senate, it varies but little from what has become the settled policy of this Government—it proposes that instead of temporary laws on this subject, we pass a permanent act, permanent as it can be, to remain until the wisdom and experience of our successors may change or repeal it. We should find it difficult to prevent people from occupying the public land on the extensive frontier; there is a large class of men who have been the pioneers of civilization and settlement in this country for many years, probably ever since the settlement of the country commenced—they are the Daniel Boones who choose to keep a little in advance of law and gospel both; they subsist more by hunting than the labors of agriculture; yet they build cabins, and clear and plant fields, and are always ready to sell their improvements to the man who moves on the frontier with his family and his stock to make a permanent settlement. It is a great advantage to the settler in a new country who has a family to provide for, to find a cabin and a clearing already made for him, and purchaseable at a moderate price; and what injury does the public interest sustain by granting these pioneers the exclusive right to purchase the land they occupy? Before this privilege was granted to them, it was quite common for mean and sordid men to hunt out the places so occupied, and purchase them at the land office, not for the sake of getting better land than they could find elsewhere, but that they might appropriate to themselves the hard earnings of the poor pioneer for nothing. Protect the poor man by a pre-emption right, and he would soon gain money enough to pay for his land; or, instead of being a prey to the heartless speculator, this latter would have to purchase his improvements, since he could not drive him off, and take forcible possession of his property. I have said that pre-emption laws, instead of being injurious to the public, are highly beneficial. They greatly facilitate the settlement of your territories, by opening the road to your lands to men with families and property, whose habits have not fitted them for settling in the wilderness. These men compose the great agricultural population of the West. Some men think, sir, that to allow land to be selected, the choice tracts to be taken up for the minimum price, is granting a great favor to the poor pioneer. I do not think so; the man who will take his axe and his rifle, and go into the frontier, forests, or prairies; far from roads, from mills and schools, and places of worship; far from all the comforts and advantages of society, pays for the pre-emption right you give him very dearly. Yes, sir, the settler, in a new country, pays the full value of the best land in the privations he endures in the hardships he encounters, and the labor he performs.

On this matter I must be allowed to speak from experience; and I know that, except in rare instances, from peculiarly fortunate location, the first settler would not be paid for the toil and suffering he has to endure, by the gift of a quarter section of land. I hear Senators speak of land in a state of nature worth from ten to fifty dollars per acre; I have never seen such land; it is not to be found in any of the fine bottoms of the West: it is an El Dorado, which exists only in the fancy.

It has been proved, I think, that Government does not get much more than the minimum price for land at the public sales; so that there is nothing to balance against this natural and long practised mode of settling your public lands. I am therefore in favor of this bill—of adopting it into our permanent land system.

Mr. WRIGHT, who also replied to some remarks of Mr. C. personal to himself, which were explained by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. LINN also followed in explanation, and also urged the propriety and necessity of appropriating money for the purpose of putting the nation in a position to maintain her honor, and defend herself from foreign aggression, instead of dividing her revenues among the States.

Mr. TALLMADGE contended that by dividing the money among the States to be devoted to the purposes of internal improvement, the best means means for national defence was adopted.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had but a very few words to say. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] in the course of his remarks to day had asserted that Senators friendly to the present Administration had argued at the last session in favor of the reduction of the wages of labor. When called upon by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. TAPPAN] to mention the names of any such Senators, he declined to comply with the request, he (Mr. B.) presumed from courtesy to those implicated in the charge. His speech at the last session in favor of the Independent Treasury Bill, so far as related to the wages of labor, had been so extensively misrepresented, out of this House, that even at the risk of having it suggested that he had made an application of the remark of the Senator to himself, he rose to disclaim any such argument. He had never risen in the Senate, he never could rise in the Senate, and use an argument in favor of reducing the wages of the poor man's labor. He was incapable of advocating any such proposition. He had disclaimed any such argument, over and over again at the last session, and he should ever disclaim it as often as it might be imputed. If the Senator from Kentucky, or any other Senator, should at any time think proper to examine his speech, and attempt to fix such a charge upon him, he should at all times be prepared to repel it, and prove that no such doctrine was contained in his speech.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and said he had but a few remarks to make; but a very general wish for adjournment being expressed,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, January 29, 1841.

Mr. BURKE asked the consent of the House to offer a resolution, that the select committee appointed at the last session on the subject of stationery and the letter of the Clerk, be reappointed.

Objection being made,

Mr. BURKE moved to suspend the rules; but the motion was negatived.

Mr. MORRIS of Ohio asked leave to introduce a bill entitled "An act to repeal an act entitled an act to provide for the safe-keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public money," approved July 4, 1840.

Objection being made,

Mr. MORRIS moved to suspend the rules, and thereupon called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MEDILL inquired of it would be in order to call for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER replying in the affirmative,

Mr. MEDILL said that he would then call for the reading of it, as he was very anxious to know what substitute his colleague proposed for the law now in force, and which was sought to be repealed.

[The bill was then read. It proposed no substitute.]

The question was then taken, and resulted—yeas 79, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Boardman, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Deller, Doe, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, James Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Granger, Green, Grinnell, Hall, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lane, Lincoln, McCarty, Francis Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Osborne, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanley, Stuart, Talliaferro, John B. So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the Treasury note bill.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the special order be postponed until Monday next, in order that the House might go into a Committee of the Whole on private bills.

But the motion of Mr. JONES having precedence, the question was taken thereon by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Anderson, Banks, Beirne, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Wm. O. So the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. WISE then took the floor, and was about to resume his remarks, but gave way to

Mr. RHETT, who wished to ask the gentleman from Virginia, whether the remark made by him on yesterday, that there was now a member of this House, who was in the South Carolina Convention, and who proposed a dissolution of the Union, was applied to him?

Mr. WISE replied in the affirmative, and said that such was the impression prevailing in the country in 1832; and if the newspapers at that time were to be believed, Mr. R. had actually proposed, or talked of proposing a dissolution of the Union.

Mr. RHETT said that the gentleman was entirely misinformed; neither he nor any other member of the convention of South Carolina ever proposed a dissolution of the Union, nor was any such proposition ever made or discussed in the convention.

Mr. WISE was glad he had made the remark, for it had given the gentleman from South Carolina an opportunity of contradicting it; and hoped, so far at least as the South was concerned, that that section of the Union would stand vindicated from the charge forever.

Mr. W. gave his views at some length in relation to the public lands, and argued against a distribution of the proceeds among the States. Rather than do so, he maintained that it would be much better to appropriate the money for the defence of the Western frontier; or, if they did not choose to do that, the lands might be disposed of for the increase of the navy, the building of steamships, &c.

He argued with much earnestness against the patronage of the Executive over the public lands, which in one year had amounted to not less than twenty-five millions of dollars. He considered it dangerous in the extreme, and as absorbing in its grasp even the State power.

While speaking on this head, Mr. W. said he would suppose that the ghost of Cicero had arisen, and was walking in the streets of Rome at midnight.

He would suppose the shade of the illustrious statesman as meeting with an inhabitant of modern Rome in the street at night, and asking him how long it would be before day.

The inhabitant pulls from his pocket a chronometer, to see the time.

"Oh! what's that?" says the ghost.

"It is a chronometer; an instrument invented by the Germans for measuring time."

"Indeed!"

The inhabitant then takes from his pocket an almanack.

"Oh!" says the ghost, "what's that?"

"It is an almanac; it is the art of printing, the wonderful means of rapidly transmitting human thought, and also invented by the Germans."

"O! how wonderful!" exclaims the ghost.

The ghost and the inhabitant then knock at the door of several citizens, but they are all asleep, and cannot be awakened.

The inhabitant then takes from his pocket a pistol, and fires it.

The ghost starts and is almost frightened back to his grave. What's that? says he, in the greatest alarm.

"Why, it is a pistol," says the inhabitant, "and explains the invention of gunpowder; also invented by the Germans."

"All invented by the Germans?" says the ghost. "and what have the Italians been doing?"

At that moment a lazy lazzaroni comes gaping up, just awoke from his sleep. "This," says the inhabitant, "is what they have been doing."

Mr. W. then applied this imaginary scene to the present state of things, in relation to Executive patronage, which, like the Germans, had been absorbing every thing, while the people, like the lazzaroni, had been gaping the while.

In concluding, Mr. W. proceeded to say that, if he differed from his friends on the present occasion, it was an honest difference arising from the conviction of his own mind that he was right. He had expressed himself in this manner because he felt bound to put himself right.

Having spoken against a tariff, and the distribution system, it would be asked, what then would he do? Why he would say, that constrained against his will, he would vote for the issue of these Treasury notes, as a temporary remedy for the present year, or at least until the meeting of the next Congress in December.

It might be asked, what would he do for the future? Why, he would fold his arms and wait. It was possible that he might never come back to that House again, and perhaps some of his friends would be very glad if he never did come back. He had this to say, however, that he could either come back or let it alone, just as he pleased. He wished it understood, though, that he was a candidate until he should say publicly that he was not. As to whether he returned or not, that would all depend upon private considerations. But if not, then his friends might depend that he would, at home, follow out the same great principles on which he had acted here.

As regarded the compromise act, that, in his opinion, ought to be left alone, until an actual and not an artificial necessity should arise. The tariff question ought not to be touched on account of a temporary deficiency.

Mr. W. then proceeded to state how, in his younger days, he had voted for General Jackson, and how he had split from him when that person, in his opinion, failed to support the principles on which he was elected. He had said, that although General Jackson was master of millions, he (Mr. W.) was master of himself. This he would say again in relation to General Harrison.

Mr. W. then contended that the proper means of sustaining the Treasury was to husband their resources at this time. Let there be no distribution, no giving away; for there could be no such thing as giving away from a beggar. The Treasury was in a state of beggary; it was empty, and there was nothing to give away. Let them be honest and pay their debts before they thought of giving any thing away. The common law would permit no will to be executed before the debts were first paid. Let them pay, then, all their honest debts before they talked of a distribution of the public lands.

The next means of relieving the Treasury was to push a vigorous system of reduction. His friend from Maine, [Mr. EVANS] who in other matters was as clear sighted a man as any in the House, could not see, the other day, how they were to get a supply by reducing the expenditures. Why, that old philosopher, Benjamin Franklin, proved that "a penny saved was a penny got," and he was surprised that his friend from Maine could not comprehend it.

But it was contended that there could be no reduction. This was not so. There could be a reduction, and a great reduction, too. He had said this before the election, and he again asserted it now. There could be a very great reduction, and that reduction ought to be pushed rigorously.

Mr. W. then noticed, as one means of reduction, a reformation among the office holders. He urged that office holders ought no longer to be permitted or expected to take part in politics. They ought, said he, to be compelled to remain at their desks, with their heads upon their business, and the pen in their hands, and to be required to mind that business. If this plan should be adopted, and every neglect, in point of time, or other inattention, however small, punished with instant dismissal, then the Government would be benefited to a great degree even in this matter. Here alone would be a great saving. But, said Mr. W. let the abominable system of proscription for political opinion be abolished. For his part he did not like this constant changing of office holders for opinion's sake, by which men were frequently brought in who were not capable of performing the duties. If a man was found to be competent, and minded his business, why not let him remain, instead of having these constant removals, by which the Government was put to a great expense by the appointment of incompetent persons. He had always denounced this system of proscription, and would they, after condemning its practice by the Loce Focos, be guilty of it themselves?

Mr. W. concluded by expressing his opinion that a National Bank would be the only effectual means of preserving a sound currency, and his belief that General Harrison would be his own President and act for himself.

Mr. HUBBARD then obtained the floor, but gave way for a motion that the committee rise; and

On the question being taken, there were—ayes 45, noes 72, no quorum voting.

The committee then rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. ANDREWS moved a call of the House, but it was not ordered.

Mr. RIVES said, that since the vote had been counted, a sufficient number of members had come in to constitute a quorum.

On motion of Mr. STANLY, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. HUBBARD then commenced his remarks in favor of the bill, and in reply to several gentlemen on the opposite side who had preceded him; but, without concluding, gave way for a motion that the committee rise; and

On that question a division was called for, when there appeared—ayes 19, noes 20—no quorum.

The committee then rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to offer the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the instructors of the pupils of the asylum for the deaf and dumb and the education of the blind, be authorized to exhibit the progress of their said pupils in this Hall for one hour and a half on Monday morning next, before the meeting of the House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved that the House adjourn; and thereupon

Mr. ANDREWS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 51, nays 22. So the House adjourned.

NOTE.—Mr. BEATTY was in the House, but not in his seat, when his name was called on the motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, to go into Committee of the Whole. If Mr. B. had been present, he would have voted in the affirmative.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 30, 1841.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the credentials of the Hon. WILLIAM C. RIVES, elected by the General Assembly of the State of Virginia a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March, 1839; which was read.

Mr. RIVES then appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the credentials of the Hon. JAMES F. SIMMONS, elected by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on file.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a message from the President of the United States, showing the necessity of a further appropriation for the completion of the preparatory survey and exploration of the Northeastern boundary of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Navy Department, with a statement of the appropriations for naval service during the year 1840; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the memorial of citizens of Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the fishing bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MOUTON presented the memorial of E. Gonon, praying the adoption of a system of telegraphs to be established between the cities of Washington and New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to continue in force the first section of an act entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, approved July 7, 1838; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, it was ordered that Christian Orandorf have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred a bill to amend an act entitled an act to grant certain relinquished and unappropriated lands to the State of Alabama, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee, Coosa, Cahawba, and Black Warrior rivers, approved May 23, 1828, and the several acts supplementary and amendatory thereto; reported the same without amendment.

The bill for the relief Juan Belgar; and The bill for the relief of the legal heirs and representatives of William Conway, were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and after being amended, on motion by Mr. MOUTON, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The joint resolution for the relief of Langree and O'Sullivan was taken up, and was advocated by Messrs. TAPPAN and PRESTON, and opposed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama and SEVIER; but without coming to any conclusion thereon—

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order—

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log-cabin thereon, was taken up, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommit the bill with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. CALHOUN, who was entitled to the floor, replied at length to the arguments of Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky and WEBSTER, and demonstrated the unconstitutionality of the distribution measure, and vindicated the measure of cession from the attacks of those gentlemen.

He was followed in the debate by Messrs. MANGUM and WEBSTER, and replied to those gentlemen.

Mr. YOUNG then took the floor, and after a few explanatory remarks, proposed as an amendment to Mr. CRITTENDEN'S motion to substitute for it the bill of Mr. CALHOUN, proposing to cede the lands to the States within which they lie, upon certain conditions, which he hoped would be ordered to be printed, and the further consideration of the subject postponed until Monday.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama assented to this course, but hoped as the debate on this question had already lasted four weeks, that it would be finally disposed of on Monday evening.

And the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, January 30, 1841.

Mr. PICKENS, by consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information or correspondence he may have in relation to recent seizures or search of any of our vessels upon the coast of Africa, or elsewhere, by British cruisers or authorities, and the cause of such search or seizure, and the authority under which they have been made.

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend the resolution by adding the following:

"And also copies of all correspondence between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain relating to the African slave trade, from the 3d of March, 1837, and of despatches from Nathaniel P. Trist, Consul of the United States at Havana, to the Department of State, relating in any way to the said African slave trade."

Mr. PICKENS accepted this amendment as a modification of his resolution.

And the resolution, thus amended, was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the House concurred in the following resolution of the Senate, adopted on the 28th inst.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following bill and resolution from the Senate were then read a first and second time, viz:

An act authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims of the State of Alabama: referred to the Committee of Claims.

A resolution authorizing sets of the standard weights and measures to be furnished to the War Department: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of five millions of dollars in Treasury notes.

Mr. HUBBARD being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday in favor of the bill. He went on to show that in the course of the debate, there was no necessity for going into the merits of the last election and other matters. The only question was on the merits of the bill then before the committee, and to that alone ought the debate to be confined. But inasmuch as members on the other side had gone into the merits of other subjects, he would consider himself as justified in slightly noticing them. He then gave his views on the subject of the distribution of the public lands and taxation, both direct and indirect.

Mr. H. then showed the great profits that a National Bank must derive from the keeping of the public deposits. The enemies of the Sub-Treasury system had urged that, by that scheme, Government would keep all the money. But would not a National Bank keep all the profits from the use of the immense amount of the public money? Certainly it would. That being the case, the bank, if established, ought to be required to pay a proper bonus, so that the people might have the worth of their money.

In regard to the false charge of the Opposition, that this Administration wished to reduce the price of labor, Mr. H. said this was in conformity with the old rule of the Opposition, in charging the Administration with what they were aiming to do themselves. He then argued that the enormous expenditures he anticipated would be made when General Harrison came into power, would be a sure means of reducing the price of labor.

Speaking of the proposed loan, advocated by some gentleman on the other side, Mr. H. declared that the State of Alabama would not accept a loan which would make her condition worse than it was before. Besides, the present distressed condition in the money market in France and England, rendered it extremely doubtful whether a loan could be obtained, if authorized.

After some further remarks in relation to the public lands, Mr. H. alluded to the specie circular of the late President Jackson. He showed that if that circular had not been issued, the whole public domain would have been swept away by worthless bank paper, and then the Opposition party would have blamed the Executive for permitting it.

Mr. JENIFER next obtained the floor, and spoke against the issue of Treasury notes, and in favor of a loan.

After some remarks in relation to the arguments urged by Mr. WISE against an extra session, Mr. J. proceeded to contend that if Gen. Harrison should call an extra session at the earliest practicable period, he would be carrying out the principles on which he was elected. If an extra session should be called only to repeal the Sub-Treasury law, that would be of itself a sufficient reason.

Mr. J. went on to express his regret that in the three days' speech of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] that gentleman had not assumed a single position which could be sanctioned by his political friends.

Mr. J. then proceeded at some length to controvert the conclusions drawn by Mr. W. in relation to the effects of a tariff on foreign wines, silks, &c. He (Mr. J.) argued that this course ought to be pursued by us as a matter of self-defence, and that to act upon this principle would be sound policy. If France had the right to lay restrictive duties on American goods, then we had the same right to lay an impost on her wines and silks; for he contended that the introduction of silks here was a benefit to France, and an injury to the cotton planter.

Mr. J. then went into the merits of the tobacco interest, and referred at great length to the policy of this country and France in relation to it.

Mr. VANDERPOEL next obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. CUSHING, who made a brief explanation, to the effect that the views of the North on the tariff question were conciliatory.

Mr. VANDERPOEL was then about to proceed, when, at the solicitation of his friends, he again yielded the floor; and a motion was made that the committee rose.

A division being called, no quorum voted.

The committee then rose, and reported that fact to the House.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows; yeas 53, nays 29.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 1, 1841.

Iowa
District of Columbia	1,249

Total 1,492 444

Also, a communication from the Governor of Iowa, transmitting resolutions of the Legislative Council on various subjects; which were referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial very numerous signed by merchants of Charleston, remonstrating against the passage of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of citizens of Oneida county, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law which will be retroactive in its operation; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial signed by a very large number of the merchants and business men of the city of Albany, against the passage of a bankrupt law similar to that of the last session; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from citizens of the borough and county of Erie, asking an appropriation to complete the construction of the harbor at that place. Mr. B. adverted to the great importance of this harbor, in case difficulties should arise with our neighbor on the northern side of the lakes, and said that without further appropriations were made to complete it, all that had been heretofore spent would have been spent in vain. He asked that the memorial might be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KING remarked that the Committee on Commerce had already taken this subject into consideration, and would report the result of their deliberations at an early day. The memorial was then referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Delaware in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States. Mr. CLAYTON and Mr. BAYARD submitted some remarks in connection with this subject, in the course of which Mr. B. intimated his intention at the next session to submit a motion to expunge the expunging resolution. The resolutions were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG presented memorials of citizens of Greene and Scott counties, Illinois, praying the establishment of certain post routes; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. Y. also presented a memorial of citizens of St. Louis, asking for aid in the construction of the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad Company, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the memorial of citizens of Logan county, Ohio, asking for the recognition of Hayti and the establishment of diplomatic relations therewith. Mr. C. said as nothing could be done with this subject at the present session, if indeed any thing ought to be done at all, he would move that the memorial should be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. STURGEON said he held in his hand resolutions passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing his colleague and himself to vote for a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States agreeably to their ratio of representation. He should obey the general tenor of the resolutions, and vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to the bill now before the Senate.

Although he was not among those who had implicit faith in legislative instructions, nor would he yield them implicit obedience, yet while he held a seat in the Senate of the United States, he should feel disposed to conform in his vote to the wishes of the people of the State which he had the honor in part to represent; and as he was inclined to believe that a majority of the people of the State of Pennsylvania may be at this time in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, he was disposed to take the resolutions of the Legislature as collateral evidence, and collateral evidence alone, of the fact. He should cast his vote accordingly.

The resolutions were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Pennsylvania, asking that a duty may be imposed on foreign silk, for the protection of the American silk grower. Mr. B. said he was entirely favorable to the object of the memorialists, but as he had stated at the last session, the Senate had no power to originate a revenue bill. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRAHAM presented a memorial of citizens of Orange county in favor of a bankrupt law; which was read, and laid on the table.

Mr. MOUTON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana in favor of the passage of a general bankrupt law, which were read, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. MOUTON, the petition and papers of the heirs of Peter Walker, and the papers of the heirs of Antonio Gras, were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WHITE presented memorials of citizens of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, praying the establishment of mail routes; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NORVELL presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of the passage of a bill making appropriations for the completion of all lake harbors commenced by the Government of the United States; which were read, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of William A. Whitehead, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill directing a survey to ascertain the practicability and expense of constructing a passage from Albemarle Sound to the Atlantic Ocean, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. K. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial asking for the erection of a new custom house at Philadelphia, moved to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, the motion to discharge the committee was laid on the table.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for the relief of Juan Belgar; and
The bill for the relief of the legal heirs and representatives of William Conway, were severally read a third time and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the relief of Pierre Babin,
The bill for the relief of George De Passau, of Louisiana,

The bill for the relief of John Compton, assignee and representative of Garrigues Flaujac,
The bill for the relief of Jean Baptiste Comeau,

The bill confirming the claim of Jean Baptiste Comeau to a tract of land in Louisiana, and

The bill for the relief of the legal representative of Therese Malette, widow of Gaspard Phiole, were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommend the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public land among the States, which Mr. YOUNG had on Saturday proposed to amend by a motion to substitute for it the bill of Mr. CALHOUN, proposing to cede the lands to the States within which they lie, upon certain conditions.

Mr. YOUNG addressed the Senate at length in favor of his motion, and in defence of the pre-emptive policy.

Mr. FULTON followed on the same side, who advocated the cession bill as a measure of justice due to sovereign States.

Mr. HUBBARD then obtained the floor, but, being late, yielded to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 1, 1841.

After the journal was read,

The Hon. HINES HOLT, of Georgia, elected to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. W. T. COLQUHITT, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

MILEAGE.

The SPEAKER stated that a member from Kentucky, Mr. S. WILLIAMS, who was confined to his room by indisposition, had presented to him an account for short mileage at a previous Congress. He did not feel authorized to issue a warrant for the payment of the account, as it related to a time when the chair was not occupied by the present incumbent. Such cases as this had formerly been adjusted by the Committee of Accounts; but since the creation of the Committee on Mileage, the committee considered its duties on the subject superseded. The present Committee on Mileage did not conceive that it could go behind the present Congress; and the SPEAKER said he was left the only alternative of submitting the matter to the House for their disposal.

Mr. WISE moved that the SPEAKER settle and adjust the account. But,

After some remarks by Messrs. SMITH of Maine, JOHNSON of Virginia, THOMPSON of South Carolina, MORGAN, WILLIAMS of Connecticut, and WHITE of Kentucky,

On motion of Mr. GRINNELL, the subject was laid upon the table.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. VANDERPOEL being entitled to the floor, observed that there was no member of the committee who had the least doubt but that the bill would pass; and yet, although there was an immediate necessity for its passage, honorable gentlemen had selected it as a mark at which to commence a sort of fire against the Administration. At such a time, when the Treasury was in immediate want of relief, he would leave it to their own consciences to say how magnanimous was such conduct.

Mr. V. then proceeded to notice the unfounded charges of the Opposition in relation to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. A gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] had contended that the Secretary had given no previous intimation that the Treasury would require relief. Such was not the case. At the last session of Congress, the Secretary had again and again called the attention of Congress to the fact, and asked the adoption of such measures as would afford relief. But no attention was paid to the warning; a deaf ear was turned to every remonstrance, and the Secretary had to go through the year as well as he could. Such charges, therefore, were unfair and unjust.

As a matter of justice to the Secretary, Mr. V. read the following extract from the annual report, to show that the attention of Congress had been again called to the matter at the commencement of the present session:

"It will be observed, however, that though, under either of these arrangements, enough might be obtained within the whole of 1841 for the objects contemplated, yet not a due or sufficient proportion in the first quarter; because by that time all the measures are not likely to go into full operation, nor much of the anticipated increase to happen in the actual receipts of duties under existing laws. Unusually heavy expenses will also fall on that quarter in the next year. In addition to a full portion of most of the current expenses, and the whole pension payments for the first half of the year, and one-third of a million, or more, for all the annual fishing bounties, there will be imposed on it most of the charges for the whole year connected with the session of Congress and private bills, as well as large payments for taking the census, and for the first instalment of the debt of this District; several of them as early even as the first day of January.

"From these circumstances, and the considerations that all which is due from the banks may not be then paid, and that the balance in the Treasury, under the policy adopted by Congress of late years, will of necessity be small, while the fluctuations and inequalities are very great between the receipts and expenditures in different portions of the year, to which we are constantly exposed from causes that have on former occasions been explained at length, it must be obvious that entire safety requires a conditional power to be seasonably conferred on the Executive to obtain at any time within 1841 such subsidiary means as may be needed for a few months, and as may be sufficient to enable the Treasury punctually to discharge, during that year, all the liabilities imposed by Congress."

How, then, could the gentleman say that no intimation had been given that the Treasury would require relief?

Mr. V. then proceeded to notice the glaring inconsistencies of those members of the Opposition who had spoken on the bill. One contended that the amount asked for was extravagant, while another would contend that it was not enough. What answer could be given when such inconsistencies were exhibited—when hot and cold were blown in the same breath.

After some further remarks on this head, Mr. V. observed that a gentleman from Tennessee had pronounced the Administration as a "niggardly" Administration. Also, that the Administration coming into power was the first one that had to depend on the Administration going out for its sustenance during the year. As for the charge of being "niggardly," said Mr. V. we are too deeply impressed with the wants of the coming Administration to be niggardly. But however large might be the sum appropriated, it would not be near sufficient to satisfy the swarm of lean, lank, ravenous expectants, who were hastening onwards. But although it was essential that a supply to the coming Administration should be made with liberality, yet it would not do to act with prodigality. When young men come into possession of their estates, it was proper that they should be restrained in the spending of their money at first, otherwise they would run into extravagant expenditures, which would soon prove ruinous.

So, while some gentlemen were denouncing the present Administration for extravagance, here was the gentleman from Tennessee complaining that the appropriations were "niggardly." It was a great pity, observed Mr. V. that the gentlemen did not take the precaution to examine each other's briefs, before they commenced the attack, and were guilty of such discrepancies, and palmed them upon the House.

The great end aimed at by all was to show there was a great debt, although they all travelled by different roads to attain that end. He (Mr. V.) was at first embarrassed to know what could be the object of those gentlemen, in their great anxiety to show the existence of a debt. But he generally found it the case that our wishes go hand in hand with our anxieties; and he now saw clearly the objects aimed at in the attempt to prove the existence of a debt, viz: a National Bank, and an extra session. Gentlemen well knew that they could never succeed in establishing a National Bank, unless Government should put its shoulder to the wheel; so there must be a national stockholder and a national debt.

As for expecting to fill up the capital of such an institution from the capitalists of the United States, it was fallacious. The distress in the money market forbade the idea. Where was the capital to be procured? Would foreign capitalists come forward? No: for the suspensions, the revulsions, and reverses, presented a spectacle that would destroy the confidence of such men. Besides, what inducement could foreign capitalists have to invest in the stocks of an institution under the control of irresponsible individuals, when they could purchase stocks of the States, where the faith of the States was pledged for their redemption.

But if they could get a national debt, and a charter for a National Bank from Congress, the difficulty would be at an end. Here was the grand secret.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. V. observed that it had been gravely determined that an extra session must be called. The dominant party could not wait the due course of time before they came into the full fruition of their power, but all the visions which, for the last six or eight months, had been dancing before them, must be realized without delay. The sub-Treasury law was to be repealed, and the money of the people taken from under the power of the law and placed under the control of the dominant party.

After advertent to the warnings of Mr. Wise on the subject of calling an extra session, Mr. V. observed that if he were acting merely as a party man, he could desire nothing better than an extra session, for nothing could be more adverse to the party coming into power. He then proceeded to show what they would have to expect from the disappointed, who would be by far more numerous than the appointed. Also how gentlemen would be compelled to show their hands, for then they could no longer play General Mum. To call an extra session some five or six weeks after General Harrison had been summoned from his log cabin into a palace, would be to that party an event, by no means pleasant in its consequences.

Mr. V. then showed how the non-committalism of General Harrison previous to his election could then be kept up no longer. He asked how could it be expected that the Northern Whig who had voted for Harrison as a friend to Abolition, would agree with the Southern Whig who had voted for him under a contrary impression.

But now it did not appear to be understood by the Opposition, what the principles of General Harrison were, for gentlemen of the same kidney were all quarrelling on the subject.

After some other remarks, Mr. V. went on to examine some of the grounds that gentlemen of the Opposition had taken to prove that the Government was in debt.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] had assumed a position that the amount of indebtedness was forty millions; other gentlemen had each come to different conclusions. Now he (Mr. V.) could not account for such strange inconsistencies, other than by supposing the existence of an hallucination of mind on this subject. He trusted, however, to show, that this debt had no other foundation than in the imagination of those gentlemen. But he started with this proposition, viz: that it was not enough to show we owed a national debt, but that a debt was chargeable upon the year for which they now proposed to make provision.

In December, 1841, the Opposition would have the whole Government in their possession, with all its resources, and then they would be able to make provision for themselves. But until then it was the duty of the present Administration to make suitable provision. That was a duty they owed to the country.

Now, if the items referred to by gentlemen as composing the debt, were not chargeable in 1841, why then was it not preposterous to ask the present Administration to make provision for debts not yet due?

Mr. V. then went into an examination of the various items by which Mr. BARNARD had contrived to make out his imaginary debt of forty millions. I regret to say, said Mr. V. that my colleague is a much better poet than arithmetician; but let us see how he undertakes to make out a debt of forty millions chargeable upon the year 1841.

In the first place, that gentleman had charged the whole principal of the debt assumed by Congress for the District of Columbia to certain citizens abroad, amounting to one million and a half of dollars. Now, what did the Secretary say on this subject:

"But it will be recollected that Congress, by an act passed in May, 1836, engaged, under special conditions, to make payment of a debt due from the cities of the District of Columbia to certain individuals abroad.

"The principal amounted to $1,500,000, and was to be paid in yearly instalments of $60,000 each, beginning the 1st of January, 1841. But the interest was payable quarterly, and, during the last four years, has been regularly discharged by the Treasury.

"Within the present year, notice has been received from the agent of the creditors that payment of the first and subsequent instalments of the principal is desired to be made, when due, with punctuality. To insure a compliance with that wish, it will be necessary, besides meeting the interest quarterly, to advance $60,000 of the principal at the commencement of the ensuing year; and the residue must be paid, in like amounts, annually hereafter, till the whole is discharged."

Now here it appeared that but $60,000, with the interest, would be required for the present year for that debt, and yet the gentleman from New York had set down the whole sum, viz: a million and a half, as chargeable upon this year.

This was the first specimen, and he would show that it was the same throughout the whole estimates.

Mr. V. then, at great length, went into an examination of other items, on which Mr. BARNARD had relied to make out his debt of forty millions, all of which he showed were without foundation.

He then, with keen sarcasm, replied to the loose charges made by Messrs. BEUL, THOMPSON, EVANS, and others against the Secretary of the Treasury; and having concluded his remarks,

Mr. TRIPLETT then obtained the floor.

A motion was made that the committee rise, which prevailed; and the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. FILLMORE submitted the following, which he desired might be read for information:

Whereas, the bill of this House, (No. 298,) entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," was taken up in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, on the 18th day of January last, and has been made under discussion to this time:

And whereas, much of the indispensable public business is yet to be acted on; therefore,

Resolved, That said committee be discharged from the further consideration of said bill, from and after the 23d day of February inst. at 3 o'clock, p. m. unless the same shall be reported to the House before that time; and that said bill, with such amendments, if any, as shall have been adopted in said committee, shall be then taken up in the House, and be the special order until finally disposed of; reserving to said committee the right, according to the rules of the House, to report the same sooner if the discussion shall terminate.

Objection being made to the reception to the resolution,

Mr. FILLMORE moved a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER informed Mr. FILLMORE that, as his resolution had reference to the disposition of the special order, which was the subject actually before the House, it did not require a suspension of the rules to consider it.

Mr. FILLMORE said he supposed, then, that his proposition was received.

The SPEAKER replied that it was.

Mr. SMITH of Maine asked the consent of the House to take up Senate bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to apply the amount due on certain contracts, entered into with the War Department, and Peter H. Green and Green and Emerson, to the extinguishment of a demand due to the United States from William King and Peter H. Green, and refer it to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. PECK objected to the motion, on the ground that, should it prevail, it would be giving the bill a preference over others which were entitled to priority.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted resolutions, adopted at a meeting of the citizens of St. Josephs, Florida, in favor of the admission of Florida into the Union; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PORTER presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, relative to the completion of lake harbors; which was laid on the table.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of inhabitants of Freeport, Maine, praying the prohibition of the domestic slave trade; the petition of the same that no new State be admitted into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery; the petition of the same praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the Territory of Florida, and the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

On motion by Mr. FULTON, the motion to receive the above was laid on the table.

Mr. R. also presented a petition of inhabitants of Freeport, praying the recognition of Hayti, and the establishment of commercial relations therewith, which was laid on the table.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the petition of the members of the bar of the State of Ohio, praying an alteration of the place of holding the summer term of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. RUGGLES, George W. Jones was permitted to withdraw his petition and papers on the files of the Senate.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Joint Committee appointed on the subject of counting the electoral votes, reported the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the two Houses will assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 10th inst. at twelve o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the journals of the two Houses.

The resolution was agreed to, and the VICE PRESIDENT was directed to appoint the teller on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PRESTON was accordingly appointed.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to authorize the selection of school lands in lieu of those granted to the half-breeds of Sac and Fox Indians, and

A bill for the relief of Isabella Hill, widow, and John Hill, Elizabeth Hill, and Samuel Hill, children and minor heirs at law of Samuel Hill, deceased, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Georgia, in favor of the settlement of the claims of her citizens for depredations by the hostile Creek Indians; and

A memorial of the same body urging the payment of the claim of Dennis Hills, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, on the ground of there being no evidence in support of the claims. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Richard Harris and Nimrod Farrow, and

The memorial of T. G. Bradford. Of the latter claim Mr. H. said there was much equity in it, but the construction by the Attorney General brought it within the prohibition of the act of March, 1839. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Robert H. Sanders; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. PORTER, was taken up, and, after some modifications, agreed to.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Colin Bishop.

PERMANENT PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, the question being as follows:

Mr. CRITTENDEN had submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report amendments thereto, to the following effect:

1. To distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States of the Union, in just and equitable proportions.

2. To grant to actual bona fide settlers upon the public lands the right of pre-emption to any quantity thereof, not exceeding one half section of 320 acres, including the place of settlement, at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, with such provisions as shall limit this right of settlement and pre-emption to actual bona fide settlers, whose estates, at the time of settlement, shall not exceed the value of $1,000; and, furthermore, with such provisions as shall effectually exclude the wealthier speculators from all benefit under this law, and shall prevent them from interfering with, or participating in, the privilege and right of settlement and pre-emption, which are hereby granted and intended for the sole advantage of the needy and honest settlers and cultivators of the soil.

Mr. YOUNG had moved to amend Mr. CRITTENDEN's motion by substituting the following:

A provision to dispose of the public lands within the limits of the new States, to the following effect:

That all the public lands within the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan, with the exceptions of the sites of fortifications, navy and dock yards, arsenals, magazines, and all other public buildings, shall, after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, be disposed of to the States within the limits of which they are respectively situated, they having previously complied with the following conditions:

First. That the said States shall severally pass acts, to be irrevocable, that they will monthly, as the sales of the said lands shall progress, pay into the Treasury of the United States, at the most convenient places of deposit, and to such officer as may be appointed to receive the same, sixty-five per cent, on the gross amount of the sales of such lands, including, under sales, grants, and donations by the States, estimating the lands at the selling price at the time of the grant or donation, on or before the first day of February of each succeeding year.

Secondly. That the minimum price, as now fixed by law, shall remain unchanged until the thirtieth day of June aforesaid; but, after that period, the price may be reduced by the States respectively, according to the following scale: all lands theretofore offered at public sale, and then remaining unsold ten years or upward, preceding the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, may be reduced by said States to a price not less than one dollar per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold fifteen years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may then be reduced by said States to a price not less than fifty cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty-five years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than twenty-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold thirty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, shall be offered immediately to the States in which said lands are situated: Provided, That all lands which shall remain unsold after having been offered at public sale for ten years, and which do not come under the above provisions, shall be subject to the provisions of pre-emption, graduation, and disposition aforesaid, at the respective periods of ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, and thirty years, after said sale, commencing from the expiration of ten years after the same shall have been offered at public sale.

Thirdly. That the lands shall be subject to the same legal subdivisions in the sale and surveys as is now provided by law, reserving for each town-ship and fractional township the sixteenth section, or the substitute, for the use of schools, as heretofore provided by law; and the land not yet offered for sale, shall be first offered by the State at public auction, except in cases of pre-emption, and be sold for cash only, in the manner now provided by law. And any land now or hereafter remaining unsold after the same shall have been offered at sale at public auction, shall be subject to entry for cash only, according to the graduation which may be fixed by the States respectively, under the provisions of this act; and that the acts of Congress which may be in force at the time of assenting to this act shall remain unchanged, except as modified by this act, unless with the assent of Congress: Provided, That any of said lands may, after they shall have become subject to private entry, be sold at the option of the purchaser, in quarter quarter sections, without any limitation whatever.

Fourth. This disposition of the public lands, together with the portion of the sales to be retained by the States respectively, under the provisions of this act, shall be in full of the five per cent. fund, or any part thereof, not already accrued to any State; and the said State shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the surveys, sales, and management of the public lands, and extinguishment of Indian title within the limits of said States, respectively.

Fifth. That, on a failure to comply with any of the above conditions, or a violation of the same, on the part of any of the said States, the cession herein made to the State (failing to comply with or violating said conditions, shall be thereby rendered null and void; and all grants or titles thereafter made by said State, for any portion of the public lands within the limits of the same, ceded by this act, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, null and void, and of no effect whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, upon every reduction in the prices of said lands, which shall take place by the graduating process of this bill, the Legislatures of the several States in which the lands are situated shall, at their discretion, have power to grant to the respective occupants or settlers upon any of said lands, rights of pre-emption at such graduated or reduced prices; which rights shall extend to a period of ninety days from and after the dates at which the respective graduations shall take place; and any lands not taken up by the respective occupants or settlers within that period, shall be liable to be entered or purchased by any other person, until the next graduation or reduction in price shall take place, when it shall, if not previously purchased, be again subject to the right of pre-emption for ninety days, as before; and so on, from time to time, as said reductions shall take place.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall be officially notified that any of the States aforesaid has passed an act in compliance with the above conditions, it shall be his duty, after the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, or forthwith after the passage of said act, if passed subsequent to that period, to adopt such measures as he shall think proper to close the land offices, including the surveying department, within the limits of said State; and that the commissions of all officers connected therewith shall expire on a day to be fixed by him, but which day shall not be beyond six months after the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, or, if subsequent thereto, from the day he received the official notification of the passage of said act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That on such notification being made, the said State shall be relieved from all compact, acts, or ordinances, imposing restrictions on the right of said State to tax any lands by her authority subsequent to the sale thereof, ceded by this act; and all maps, titles, records, books, documents, and papers, in the General Land Office at Washington, relative to said lands, or duplicates thereof, where the originals cannot properly be transferred, shall be subject to the order and disposition of the Executive of said State, in such manner as the Legislature of said States may respectively appoint.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all lands of the United States within the limits of the State of Tennessee, with the exceptions enumerated in the first section of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, ceded to said State.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sixty-five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales, hereby secured to be paid to the United States, shall be set apart and exclusively applied to the gradual increase of the navy, and the erection of such fortifications for the general defence of the country, as Congress may by law hereafter order and direct.

Mr. HUBBARD, who was entitled to the floor, spoke at much length in opposition to the amendment of Mr. CRITTENDEN and the distribution policy.

Mr. H. was followed in the debate by Messrs. CALHOUN, WEBSTER, BENTON, CLAY of Alabama, PIERCE, HENDERSON, RIVES, ROANE, PORTER, and CRITTENDEN. Messrs. PIERCE and ROANE stated that they would vote for Mr. Young's amendment merely because they preferred it to that of Mr. CRITTENDEN, but that they were opposed to the passage of either of them.

The question was then taken on Mr. Young's amendment, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 20, noes 31, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Tappan, Walker, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bates, Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, and Wright—31.

The question was then taken on Mr. CRITTENDEN's motion to recommit with instructions, and decided in the negative—ayes 22, noes 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bates, Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 31, noes 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, and Southard—19.

So the bill was passed, and ordered to be sent to the House for concurrence.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then moved that the Senate take up the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had voted against the bankrupt bill at the last session, and might probably feel compelled to do so at the present; nevertheless, if the friends of the measure insisted on its being taken up, he would interpose no obstacle in their way. But we were now within four weeks of the termination of the session; the bankrupt bill would give rise to an extended discussion, and it could not be passed in time to give it the least chance of passing in the other House. He therefore appealed to the friends of the bill whether it was proper to set aside all the pressing business of the session in order to discuss a measure which there was no probability of passing; or whether it would not be better to postpone the consideration of the bankrupt bill until the special session, which it was generally understood was to be called, and to devote themselves to the consideration and perfecting of the many bills now on their calendar, and to pass those measures which the public exigencies demanded.

Mr. CALHOUN here moved an adjournment, and after some discussion, the motion prevailed.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, February 2, 1841.

Mr. SERGEANT asked the permission of the House to present the resolutions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania relative to the public lands and the revenue of the United States, and moved that they be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. FORNANCE moved to amend the motion by adding the following:

Resolved, That the resolutions be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of revising the whole tariff. And further, that said committee inquire whether it will be necessary to increase the tariff in order to raise sufficient revenue to meet the probable expenses of Government for the year 1841.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said that as the motion could only be entertained by general consent, he felt constrained to object, as there was business of great importance now pending before the House.

Mr. SERGEANT inquired what disposition had been made of the resolutions?

The SPEAKER replied that they could only be received by general consent.

Mr. SERGEANT then moved to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER said there was already a motion to suspend the rules pending, for the purpose of receiving the resolution introduced on yesterday by Mr. FILLMORE; and that, when that question was taken, then the motion of Mr. SERGEANT would be in order.

Mr. LINCOLN asked leave to present a resolution from the Committee on Public Lands, rescinding the resolution of the House passed on the 16th of January, authorizing the printing of ten thousand extra copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Mr. L. said he was authorized by the committee to say that their impression, at that time, was that the coloring of the maps would cost but three cents each—in all but two or three hundred dollars; that it was now ascertained that the cost of coloring would amount to $6 240.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution of the House, of the 16th of January last, directing the printing of 10,000 extra maps of the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be arrested in its further execution,—so far that no more maps may be printed under the resolution, and no more of the maps already printed, be colored or painted:

And, on the question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the following resolution, offered by him on yesterday, be now taken up:

Whereas, the bill of this House, (No. 298,) entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," was taken up in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, on the 18th day of January last, and has been made under discussion to this time:

And whereas, much of the indispensable public business is yet to be acted on; therefore,

Resolved, That said committee be discharged from the further consideration of said bill, from and after the 3d day of February inst. at 3 o'clock, p. m. unless the same shall be reported to the House before that time; and that said bill, with such amendments, if any, as shall have been adopted in said committee, shall be then taken up in the House, and be the special order until finally disposed of; reserving to said committee the right, according to the rules of the House, to report the same sooner if the discussion shall terminate.

The SPEAKER here stated that he had received this resolution yesterday, under the impression that it did not require a suspension of the rules to entertain it; that upon a more mature reflection he found he had erred, and that it was necessary to suspend the rules to receive and act upon it.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved a suspension of the rules; and

The question was about being taken, when,

Mr. CRABB called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 127, noes 40, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Blackwell, Boardman, Bond, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Clark, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Doan, Doe, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Fisher, Galbraith, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Griffin, Grinnell, Hall, Hand, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hopkins, Jackson, James, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kempshall, Kille, Lane, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McClure, Meredith Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Montanya, Montgomery, Moore, Calvary Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Palen, Parrish, Parmenter, Paynter, Peck, Prentiss, Proffit, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Jas. Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Samuels, Simonton, Slade, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sweney, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Toland, Turney, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Waterson, Edward D. White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—127.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Beirne, Black, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Chittenden, Coles, James Cooper, Crabb, Dawson, Dennis, Dellei, Dromgoole, Fornance, Gates, Graham, Green, Habersham, Hawes, Hubbard, Hunt, Jenifer, King, Francis Mallory, Monroe, Morgan, Nisbet, Pickens, Rives, Sergeant, Shepard, Truman Smith, Sumter, Triplett, Warren, Weller, John White, and Lewis Williams—40.

So the rules were suspended.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES moved that the House go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the special order.

Mr. SERGEANT hoped that some disposition would first be made of the resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER again said that it required the general consent of the House.

Mr. SERGEANT then moved to suspend the rules, and thereupon called for the yeas and nays; but

Mr. JONES of Virginia withdrawing his objection, they were not ordered.

The question was taken, and the resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania were ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. JONES, and decided in the affirmative.

So the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of five millions of dollars in Treasury notes.

Mr. TRIPLETT being entitled to the floor, was about to commence his remarks, but gave way to

Mr. CURTIS, who submitted the following, which he gave notice he should, when it would be in order to do so, move as an amendment to the bill under consideration:

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever proof shall be exhibited, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the loss or destruction of any Treasury note issued under the authority of any act of Congress, it shall be lawful for the said Secretary, upon receiving bond, with sufficient security, to indemnify the United States against any other claim on account of the Treasury note alleged to be so lost or destroyed, to pay the amount due on such note, to the person who had lost, or in whose possession it had been destroyed.

Mr. CURTIS remarked that this section was an exact transcript of the law of 1819, authorizing the payment, in certain cases, on account of Treasury notes, which have been lost or destroyed.

Mr. TRIPLETT then spoke at some length in reply to the remarks of Mr. VANDERPOEL on yesterday. After some preliminary observations, Mr. T. proceeded to assure the committee that, under the administration of General Harrison,

No trifter or deceiver
Would be appointed a receiver.

Also, under the same Administration, gentlemen might be assured that

No man addicted to grabbin'
Would be permitted to enter the log cabin.

Mr. T. said he would deny that there was a solitary Whig member in the House, or out of it, who desired a called session, unless they should be driven to it by imperative necessity. He then went on to show what, in his opinion, was the actual state of the Treasury, and that the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury were not correct. He contended that the deficiency was not temporary, but permanent.

In the course of his remarks on protective duties on foreign luxuries, Mr. T. alluded to the tobacco interest. He called attention to the fact that while our cotton was taxed in England but 33½ per cent. the tax on tobacco was eight hundred per cent. This, he contended, was enough to arouse the blood of any man of the tobacco growing States. The States of Greece once poured out their forces in a body upon Troy to avenge a single individual; and ancient Rome once rose in arms on account of a single citizen; but here were a million and a half of our citizens interested in the tobacco question, and no attention was paid to their wrongs.

Mr. T. concluded by replying in detail to the arguments of Mr. Wise on that subject.

Mr. COLES of Virginia then obtained the floor, and after some preliminary remarks in relation to the anticipated measures of the coming Administration, said he would vote for the bill because he believed the wants of the country required it.

Mr. C. adverted to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and vindicated the same from the unfounded attacks made upon it. The expenditures of the year, it was true, were founded on the report of the Secretary; but gentlemen need raise no objection on that account, for the whole appropriations, with the exception of about a million, were under the control of Congress. These appropriations they had the power to regulate as they might think proper.

After showing that, if the appropriations were kept within proper bounds, there would be sufficient means to meet every demand during the year, Mr. C. explained that the notes required now were merely for a temporary assistance to the Treasury, to enable it to anticipate the receipts; and that a permanent deficiency, as some gentlemen endeavored to make out, would not necessarily be the case.

He then defended the emission of Treasury notes as in strict conformity to the Constitution.

But this mode of raising money had been objected to because it was the easiest mode. He then showed that this objection amounted to no more than an objection to dealing at the nearest store.

He considered that five millions of these notes, under present circumstances, were amply sufficient to cover the inequalities now existing between the receipts and expenditures; and at the end of the year, unless he was grossly deceived, there would be a sufficient amount in the Treasury to redeem them.

Mr. C. then, at some length, exposed the fallacious arguments of those gentlemen who had attempted to prove the existence of a national debt. They would find that there was no debt authorized by law; and if there was to be a debt, it must depend on the future action of Congress.

Mr. C. then spoke at some length in relation to the tobacco interest of this country, and the necessity of the protection of that interest.

The remark of Mr. C. will appear hereafter.

Mr. BLACK said, that he would not have risen to speak on the subject, if the merits of the bill had been kept before the House; in relation to the adoption of which, he presumed no man doubted the necessity. But there were other topics connected with this subject, and had grown out of it. They were important to the people who sent him here. He did not, however, speak so much as a Representative, as one of the sovereign people of Georgia. His representative capacity was fast expiring, and, in a few days more, all the trappings of office would be taken from him. He would then go back to Georgia and mingle with the people who sent him here. But while here, he had the double right to speak, not only in his representative capacity, but as one of the people.

Mr. B. after some remarks in relation to his own State, alluded to a pictorial representation of himself, and some of his colleagues from Georgia, which was exhibiting, and for sale in the stores on the avenue. The idea sought to be conveyed by that pictorial representation, Mr. B. pronounced as a base slander, both in its conception and execution.

He then alluded to the remarks of Mr. VANDERPOEL on yesterday, and said that, although that speech gave him great pleasure, yet there was one portion of it for which he had to express his regret. The gentleman had thought proper to intimate that as so much had been said about the interests of the South, he supposed that New York and Pennsylvania would, after a while, be considered as mere colonies.

But, Mr. B. said what would all the vaunted commerce of the North and East be without our Southern product—our cotton. If it were not for the cotton of the South, how could the North freight their ships. Would they load them with onions, apples, and wooden nutmegs? No, if it were not for the cotton, their boasted commerce would fall at once. Mr. B. merely referred to this as an answer to what the gentleman from New York had said; but he thought it was impolitic and useless to institute such comparisons.

After adverting to the singular discrepancies between the statements of Messrs. BARNARD, EVANS, BELL, and others of the Opposition, who had undertaken to abuse the Administration as extravagant, Mr. B. said he would take his ground on this broad fact, which he commended to the especial notice of Southern men. He asserted that since Mr. Van Buren had been in power, he had, with a decreasing revenue, and an increasing country, reduced the expenditures of the Government nearly ten millions of dollars.

Mr. B. then proceeded to prove this by reference to authentic documents: after which, in a very severe manner, he animadverted on the conduct of those gentlemen who had charged the Administration with extravagance.

He showed that the extraordinary expenditures of the Florida war, the public buildings, the removal of the Indians, the pensions, had all been charged upon the present Administration as ordinary expenses; and yet, notwithstanding all these disadvantages, Mr. Van Buren had managed to reduce the expenditures nearly ten millions of dollars.

Mr. B. then gave his views on the tariff, a National Bank, and other subjects broached by the speakers of the Opposition. And having concluded,

A motion was then made that the committee rise; which prevailed.

But no quorum voting, the committee rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. ALFORD moved that the House again go into a committee of the whole.

Mr. ADAMS asked that the House be counted to see whether a quorum was present; and

On counting the House, the SPEAKER declared that there were sixty members present.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the House now adjourn.

On that question, the yeas and nays were called; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 27, nays 26.

So the House adjourned.

The committee appointed on Saturday last to ascertain and report a mode of examining and counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, consists, on the part of the House, of Mr. CUSHING, Mr. JONES of Virginia, Mr. GRANGER, Mr. DAWSON, and Mr. ATHERTON; on the part of the Senate, of Mr. PRESTON, Mr. HUBBARD, and Mr. HUNTINGTON.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a message from the President of the United States in compliance with a resolution of the Senate in relation to the survey, to ascertain and designate the boundary line between the State of Michigan and the Territory of Wisconsin; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Commissioner of Patents, showing the operations of the Patent Office during the year 1840; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a remonstrance from a large number of citizens of Seneca, New York, in opposition to the passage of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of the pilots of the port of New York, praying for a repeal of the pilot law of 1837; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented eleven memorials of saddlers and harness makers of Philadelphia, praying the imposition of a duty on foreign saddlery and harness; which were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the memorial of certain manufacturers and mechanics of the United States, praying the passage of a law for the security of the rights of the proprietors of designs and patent; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition of thirty-four citizens of Perry county, Ohio, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to alter the place of holding one of the terms of the Circuit and District Courts in Ohio; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill granting to the county of Johnson, in the Territory of Iowa, the right of pre-emption to a tract of land for a seat of justice for said county, and repealing the second section of an act, approved the 3d March, 1839, entitled "An act making a donation of land to the Territory of Iowa, for the purpose of erecting public buildings thereon," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred a bill for the relief of the representatives of Captain William Williams, late of the State of North Carolina, deceased, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office, reported a bill to authorize the Postmaster General to settle the claims of William Neil and Co. which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting a pre-emption right to Esch Evans; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire the expediency of granting a pension to the widow of the late Captain Davis of the 3d artillery, who died in consequence of sickness and exposure in his endeavors to perform duty in the late gallant expedition of Lieutenant Colonel Harney, through the Everglades in Florida.

The resolution was agreed to, and, with accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Bridgeville, by way of Fairfield, in Pickens county, Alabama, to Macon, in Noxubee county, Mississippi.

Mr. ROBINSON said he was instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to move that 2500 copies of the report of Mr. Plitt upon the administration of the post offices in the different kingdoms of Europe, be printed for the use of the Senate.

This motion gave rise to an extended debate, in which Messrs. ROBINSON, TAPPAN, CRITTENDEN, BUCHANAN, PRESTON, LINN, HUNTINGTON, SMITH of Connecticut, CALHOUN, KNIGHT, and LUMPKIN, participated. The controverted point in the discussion was the authority of the Postmaster General to depute an agent to Europe, which was answered by the production of a resolution of the Senate requiring him to collect information which could not otherwise be procured. Most of the Senators bore strong testimony to the ability and value of the report of Mr. Plitt, and the faithfulness with which he had performed the duties confided to him. The resolution to print was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Nathaniel Pryor, deceased.

The bill for the relief of Ephraim D. Dickson.

The bill for the relief of J. M. Strader.

On motion by Mr. PRENTISS, the bill for the relief of John McNeil was taken up, considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved that the consideration of the special orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to consider the bill establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy, which, after some discussion, was agreed to, with an understanding that it would be taken up to-morrow at one o'clock.

On motion by Mr. KING, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1841.

Mr. CUSHING said he was instructed by the joint committee appointed to examine the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and to notify the persons elected of their election, to ask that the House concur in the following resolution:

Resolved, That the two houses will assemble in the chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 10th of February, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be declared to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the journals of the two Houses.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. LEET asked leave to present, and have referred, the memorial of Benedict Reynolds, of Washington county, Pennsylvania, praying for a pension. Objections being made, leave was not granted.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and resume the consideration of the special order.

Mr. STEENROD moved a reconsideration of the vote, taken on yesterday, by which the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas, the bill of this House, (No. 298,) entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," was taken up in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, on the 18th day of January last, and has been made under discussion to this time:

And whereas, much of the indispensable public business is yet to be acted on; therefore,

Resolved, That said committee be discharged from the further consideration of said bill, from and after the 21 day of February inst. at 3 o'clock, p. m. unless the same shall be reported to the House before that time; and that said bill, with such amendments, if any, as shall have been adopted in said committee, shall be then taken up in the House, and be the special order until finally disposed of; reserving to said committee the right, according to the rules of the House, to report the same sooner if the discussion shall terminate.

Mr. WISE said he hoped a vote on the motion to reconsider would be taken, as he had an amendment to propose, so as to put the coming Administration on precisely the same footing as the present Administration, in regard to the issue of Treasury notes; and he hoped the motion would prevail, simply for the purpose of allowing his amendment to be introduced. The substance of the amendment was this: give the succeeding Administration the power, in case there were five millions outstanding on the 4th of March, to issue five millions thereafter.

After some conversation between Messrs. PECK and L. WILLIAMS, the amendment was then read, as follows:

Provided, That in case the Treasury notes outstanding and unredeemed, issued under former laws of Congress, added to the amount of such notes issued under the act and actually expended, or issued to meet payments due and payable before the 4th day of March next, shall, on the 4th day of March next, exceed the sum of five millions of dollars, then the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby authorized to issue, by virtue of the provisions of this act, such further amount of the said notes as will make the whole amount issued under this act and applicable to payments falling due after the 4th day of March next, the full sum of five millions of dollars.

The question then recurring on the motion to reconsider,

Mr. DAWSON raised a question of order. It was this: whether the resolution adopted on yesterday had not become the rule of the House? If that was the case, then the House could not change the order.

Mr. PECK inquired whether a majority could reconsider or postpone it.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WATTERSTON moved the previous question; which was seconded.

The question then recurring on the main question; whereupon,

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 96, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Atherton, Banks, Bond, Boyd, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, John Campbell, Carroll, Casey, Chittenden, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Craig, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, John Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Doan, Doig, Eastman, Fine, Fisher, Fornance, Galbraith, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Granger, Green, Griffin, Habersham, John Hastings, Hawes, Holmes, Jackson, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Lane, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, Francis Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Medill, Miller, Monroe, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Sergeant, Shepard, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, John B. Thompson, Triplett, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Wise—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Baker, Beatty, Boardman, Brewster, A. V. Brown, Carr, Chinn, Clark, Connor, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Cushing, Edward Davies, Dickerson, Doe, Dromgoole, Earl, Everett, Giddings, Hall, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of N. C. James, Joseph Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, Meredith Mallory, Montanya, Moore, Morrow, Nisbet, Osborne, Parmenter, Paynter, Peck, Proffit, Russell, Saloonstall, Simonton, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Sweney, Toland, Turney, Vroom, John White, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—53.

So the rules were suspended.

The resolution of Mr. FILLMORE being now before the House,

Mr. WISE moved to amend the same by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That after three o'clock the debate on the bill shall cease, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the various amendment submitted, and to be submitted, and then report the bill, with the amendments agreed to by the committee, to the House."

After some remarks by Messrs. WISE and BRIGGS,

Mr. STEENROD, in reply to a question from Mr. CUSHING, said he did not move for the reconsideration for the purpose of reopening the debate, but merely to enable his colleague [Mr. WISE] to submit his amendment.

The question was then stated on agreeing to Mr. WISE's amendment to Mr. FILLMORE's resolution; when

Mr. TURNEY called for the previous question.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the resolution do lie upon the table.

At this stage of the proceedings, and before any question was taken,

Mr. FILLMORE inquired whether it would be in order for him to withdraw his resolution.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative; and Mr. FILLMORE then withdrew his resolution.

Mr. BLACK asked whether it would be in order to move that both resolutions be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER replied that one of them had been withdrawn.

Mr. MORGAN inquired whether it would now be in order to move to go into a committee of the whole.

The SPEAKER said that a motion to that effect had already been made.

The question was about being taken on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, when

Mr. STEENROD called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 92, nays 81, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Andrews, Baker, Beatty, Bell, Black, Boardman, Brewster, Briggs, Bynum, Calhoun, John Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Connor, James Cooper, Crabb, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Doe, Dromgoole, Everett, Fillmore, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Granger, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hiland Hall, Hawes, Thomas Henry, Hines Holt, Francis James, D. Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Kemble, Kempshall, King, Lane, Lewis, Lincoln, McCarty, Meredith Mallory, Francis Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Moore, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Morrow, Nisbet, Osborne, Peck, Proffit, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Jas. Rogers, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, John B. Thompson, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Watterson, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Atherton, Banks, Blackwell, Bond, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Sampson H. Butler, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cranston, Cross, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Galbraith, Garland, Giddings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Holmes, Hopkins, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McClure, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikon, Prentiss, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shepard, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vroom, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Wise—81.

Mr. WISE rose to a point of order. He said that the House had, by a vote of two-thirds, adopted the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] and put it upon the journal. To-day a motion was made to reconsider the resolution. It was reconsidered; it was part of the question before the House, and was subject to amendment. The SPEAKER decided that the gentleman from New York had the right to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER reminded Mr. W. that he should have made his point of order before the vote was declared.

Mr. WISE said he was compelled to appeal from the decision of the Chair; and gave notice that, after the committee came into the House, he would present his point of order.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of five millions of dollars in Treasury notes.

Mr. WELLER being entitled to the floor, spoke at some length in favor of the bill, and in reply to the objections urged against it.

After explaining the circumstances under which the Secretary of the Treasury asked for this temporary aid, Mr. W. proceeded to notice the fallacious arguments of the Opposition in attempting to prove the existence of a national debt.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. W. observed that before the election, the cry was that the Administration was "extravagant;" and abuse without end was poured out upon it. But now the cry was suddenly changed, and our ears were assailed by the charge of "mean parsimony." By way of illustration, Mr. W. alluded to the elaborate speech of Mr. Ogle in relation to the President's furniture, which speech had furnished a theme for all the small beer politicians in denouncing the Administration for extravagance. Now, however, the charge had been entirely reversed, and the Administration, instead of being extravagant, was abused for "mean, niggardly parsimony."

Mr. W. then gave his views at some length on the pre-emption bill, the distribution, and graduation system, &c. He afterwards commented upon the conflicting conclusions to which members of the Opposition had come, as to the measures proper to be adopted. He contended that this want of unanimity was conclusive evidence that General Harrison had not come out and announced himself and his politics. If that individual had, as was contended, announced himself, how was it that his supporters differed so widely in their views? Mr. W. made some further remarks, which will be given hereafter in full.

Mr. BRACKENRIDGE then took the floor in opposition to the mode of relieving the Treasury by the issue of these notes, and in favor of a loan. He denied that it was the wish of the Whig party to have an extra session of Congress. Besides, that did not come within their province. It was not for them to say whether there should be an extra session or not. That was the province of the President; and as Mr. Van Buren had once called an extra session, why should not General Harrison, if he saw fit, be allowed the same privilege? But he, Mr. B. hoped there would be no reason for calling an extra session. It would all depend, however, on the amount of means appropriated. He considered five millions as by far too little, and that at least ten millions ought to be provided.

Mr. MONROE said, he would take up, but fifteen minutes of the time, inasmuch as he intended to confine his remarks to the merits of the bill, instead of discussing matters having no connection with it. He had no doubt but that twenty millions of dollars could be raised on Government bonds at five per cent. in a short period. But that would not suit the views of the Administration, for they had so great a repugnance to any thing which bore the appearance of a debt.

After some further remarks in favor of relieving the Treasury by means of a loan, Mr. M. proceeded to define his position, and, in the course of his remarks on that head, touched upon the tariff question and the compromise act. He gave it as his opinion that the Southern members could not be brought to agree on any bill for a tariff. He would venture to say that if he should give any Southern man a week to prepare a tariff bill, no other Southern man could be found who would agree to it.

A member here asked Mr. M. whether the Northern members could agree.

Mr. MONROE said, yes they could; and their being able to agree was owing to their common school system. The education Northern men received in their common schools, taught them common sense.

Mr. M. was then proceeding in defining his position, when

Mr. WISE asked him if he had received his practical education in the common schools.

Mr. MONROE said, no; for he had remained too long in the South to have much practical education.

Mr. WISE said he had the advantage over some, for he was so fortunate as to get his education in the North.

Mr. MONROE said the gentleman from Virginia had the advantage of him, if he was so fortunate as to get an education any where.

After some further remarks of a humorous character, Mr. M. contended that although there might be enough for the present wants of Government, yet due consideration ought to be had to the state of our army and navy. It was well known that we were not in a condition to meet a hostile force; and Congress would not do its duty, unless it made a sufficient appropriation for placing the army and navy on a proper footing.

Mr. ALFORD regretted the necessity for his rising to take part in the debate, but when he saw the conduct of his friends in attempting to stamp the coming Administration with features it ought not to bear, he could not remain silent in his seat. He felt it his duty to rise and say a few words on the subject, because he differed honestly from his friends, and had his suspicions as to the course they thought proper to pursue. Yes, he would assure them that he ever would act as an honest man; and they might be assured that, so long as the patriotic citizens of his State honored him with a seat on that floor, he would speak out his sentiments, and, so far as he was able, do them justice.

Mr. A. said he regretted the introduction of so many topics having no manner of connection with the bill, which he did not care much whether it passed or no. But as his vote would not turn the scale either way, for the sake of consistency he might give it against the bill. At the same time, however, he must express his opinion that the present state of the Treasury imperatively demanded that something should be done.

But he would repeat, that the bill before them had been nearly lost sight of in the debate; for no sooner was it introduced, than the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] gave notice of his intention, after moving to strike out the enacting clause, to introduce an amendment laying a tax on foreign wines, silks, and other articles.

It was to this fact that his attention had been fixed, and his fears aroused. Here were suddenly developed the plans of the high tariff party of the North; and all the fine spun arguments in favor of that dreadful system had been retailed on the floor, no doubt long ago prepared in the closet, and spun and wove in the elegant manufactures of the North. It was this scheme of a high tariff in disguise, which he complained of, and he thought he saw it at the first movement of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.]

He, Mr. A. believed that coming events cast their shadows before, and he thought he could see in this movement of the high tariff men of the North, a design to build up the manufacturing interests at the sacrifice of the rights of the South. His friends must permit him to give his honest opinions, for honest he would be in spite of any man or any party. No party ever had power to crush his opinions.

Mr. A. then proceeded to show that a tariff of protection for the manufactures would not be the less sensibly felt because it was sought to be introduced under the plausible and specious pretence of a tariff for raising revenue. He believed he could foresee, under this plausible pretext, a design to introduce measures for a high tariff of protection, and one of the most oppressive character that the South could possibly bear.

Mr. A. then proceeded to argue that the attempts of Messrs. BARNARD, EVANS, BELL, and others, to swell the expenditures of Government, were to furnish a pretext for a high tariff. The object of those gentlemen was to make the expenditures of Government as high as possible, that there might be a plausible pretext for a high tariff.

But why should the tariff question be agitated before there is any necessity for it? This, in his opinion, was decidedly the worst feature in the whole business. Why did gentlemen expend such mighty labor in attempting to prove the existence of an enormous debt, in order that the American people might be persuaded that a high and mighty tariff was necessary?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] had attempted to prove the existence of a necessity for forty millions, and that it will be necessary to raise this forty millions by a tariff. But he, Mr. A. would ask that gentleman, whether he really believed himself in his own calculation? Was the gentleman really in earnest? Was that a proper calculation for the economical administration of General Harrison? The compromise act declared that no more tariff should be laid than was sufficient to meet the necessities of Government; but here the high tariff men were marking out an enormous Government debt for the purpose of raising an almighty tariff.

In reply to a question from Mr. W. THOMPSON, Mr. A. said he condemned the past extravagance of the present Administration, but now the election had been decided, he was not the man to fight a dead corpse. He was sure his friends would not suspect him of not being friendly to General Harrison. I will (said Mr. A.) sustain him to the death, and do my duty to the South, notwithstanding all the scowling of my Northern friends. Yes, I will support Harrison. I supported him when he had but few other supporters, and I will support him now. Were I to do otherwise, it would be unjust and unkind towards my constituents, those noble fellows of Georgia, who took the lead, and went ahead in this business.

After some further remarks of the above nature Mr. A. again adverted to the strange calculations of his Northern friends, who had attempted to prove the existence of a great national debt as a pretext for a high tariff. He begged them to make their calculations over again, and see if they were not a little mistaken.

It was his firm belief that there was no necessity for any tariff at all at this time for raising revenue. Where, then, was the cause for the labored arguments of gentlemen to show this necessity for raising forty millions. Was the necessity founded in fact? No, it was not. The whole of it was founded on the manufacturing interest of the North. Was not that the real and plain truth? Had not the whole scheme, and the arguments, been spun, wove, reeled, and dyed in the elegant manufactures of the North? Yes, they might depend upon it, that this whole scheme of showing an enormous debt, was of Northern manufacture. The texture was beautiful, but he would warn his Southern friends to take heed in time, and not suffer themselves to be caught in its fine-spun web. As for himself, they might rest assured that he would never be forced into the ranks of the enemy. Although he respected his Northern friends, and gave them credit for honest motives, yet he could not surrender his judgment in matters where he clearly foresaw the interests of the South must suffer. He object was to stand up and to act for the South, the fairest portion of the world, which was once blooming like the garden of Eden before its fields were destroyed by the oppressive tariff law.

Mr. A. then went on to show that this forty millions was wanted by the North for building their lighthouses, harbors, fortifications, etc. Not however that he was against a proper display of defence, for he believed that the only way of preventing hostilities was to make a show of fight. He knew that from experience; for he had been saved many a drubbing by an apparent willingness to fight.

Mr. A. then alluded to a former speech on the Canadian border troubles, and said that now, as well as then, he would urge a proper display of determination on our part to repel the aggression of the British lion. If we did that, there would be no fear; and if ever the British lion of Queen Victoria should come roaring to the Falls of Niagara, he would there find the American Eagle sitting in majesty, at the sight of which, he would cast himself down that mighty cataract, howling in despair.

Mr. A. again repeated his warning to his friends of the South in relation to the tariff web, which was thus weaving to catch them. They might depend that this proposition for a tariff on wines and silks at this time was a ruinous thing.

Mr. A. then proceeded to contend that it was perfectly just and reasonable to afford the present Administration all the assistance it required. As for the calculations of gentlemen to show how much was owing, they amounted to nothing, for their could be no premises on which to found such calculations. Time only could show how much was owing. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had asked only for five millions, and the Administration contended that this was all they needed. But there was some difference between this five millions, and the forty millions sought to be made out by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD.]

He (Mr. A.) must be permitted to say, that he did believe this movement on the part of his Northern friends, was all a hoax to forestall the coming Administration, and to say that Van Buren went out of power with a debt of forty millions, to show the necessity for a high tariff.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] had contended that this forty millions must be paid immediately by a tax on wines and silks. Now the honorable chairman of the Indian Committee spoke like one having authority; yes, just as if the robes of office were already hanging from his shoulders. As to that, he (Mr. A.) had not the smallest objection, for he hoped his friend would get an office. And, continued Mr. A. all who are in favor of that will say "ay." [laughter.] But according to the statement of that gentleman, and that of the gentleman from New York together, the amount required for the coming Administration was swelled to a hundred and twenty millions! Great God! said Mr. A. what a state of things! and all to show the necessity of a mighty tariff.

He then proceeded to express his opinion that this description of things had been meaningly and purposely brought about by the gentleman from New York; there could be no question of it. He called on his colleagues from Georgia now to remember what he had told them, when this proposition of the gentleman [Mr. BARNARD] was first introduced. He had told them that this would open the discussion, and what would be the consequences of it.

After some further remarks, Mr. A. drew a glowing picture as to what must be the consequences of this tariff measure to the South. Here was a sum of a hundred and twenty millions sought to be proved as required by the coming Administration, and the means of raising it was to place a tax upon luxuries. He appealed to the tariff men of 1828, who laid a tax upon the poor man's salt, his sugar and molasses, and who ground his constituents into the dust, as to whether they were now sincere in their proposition to tax luxuries. If they were now sincere, he would go with them in what was right; but he must tell them that he looked upon them with a suspicious eye.

After giving his views in detail on the policy pursued towards the South in relation to the tariff, Mr. A. said that it was not his intention to exempt silk from taxation; but this was the wrong time; it was bad policy to introduce the subject now.

The movers in this matter knew very well that the scheme could not be pushed through at the present session, and if it could, it would not afford relief in time. What then was the object? Why it was to forestall public opinion—to show the overwhelming necessity of a high tariff, and to bring it down upon them at the called session. This was true as Holy Writ.

Mr. A. proceeded to argue that the proper course would be to leave the tariff question until the regular session of Congress, when the people of the South would come up to it like men, and object to no reasonable plan for raising revenue to meet the wants of the Government.

He then referred to the plan for a distribution of the public lands, and maintained that it was only a gilded bait. It was a plan to abstract some millions from the revenue. It was a secret pulling of the wires by the tariff men before General Harrison came into power.

As to the wants of Government, it was his opinion that the present duties on imports would be amply sufficient to meet the wants of the coming Administration; for the election of Harrison had infused life and confidence every where, and from all appearances there would be no lack of means.

After adverting to several other topics, Mr. A. concluded by warning his friends against a called session. He reminded them that a called session was the cause of the downfall of Mr. Van Buren, and he feared such a course would have the same effect on the fortune of General Harrison.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 4, 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the Senate requiring a plan of home valuation on goods imported, instead of valuation in foreign countries; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of forty-two citizens of Brown county, Ohio, praying the passage of a bankrupt law, including banks; which was laid on the table.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting the exports and imports of sugar during the year ending the 30th September, 1840; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial from citizens of Camden, South Carolina, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial of Gen. Edmund P. Gaines, submitting a system of national defence; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. T. also presented a memorial of citizens of Albany, remonstrating against the passage of the bankrupt bill; which was laid on the table.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill confirming the claim of the heirs of Antonio Gras to a tract of land in Louisiana; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Thankful Reynolds; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill granting a pre-emption right to Enoch Evans, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. KING, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize Alexander Pope to introduce materials for three iron steamboats free of duty; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of American water rotted hemp, reported a joint resolution on the subject; which was read, and ordered a second reading.

Mr. ANDERSON gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Langtree and Jenkins.

The bill for the relief of John MacNeil was read a third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. KING, the memorial of Samuel H. Thompson, now on file, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The CHAIR then announced the general orders.

Mr. STURGEON asked that they might be postponed, for the purpose of taking up the bill for the relief of Eliza Causin, daughter and heir of John H. Stone, deceased.

Mr. RUGGLES moved that all the orders be postponed, for the purpose of taking up the bill for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

Mr. CRITTENDEN hoped that neither of these bills would be taken up, but that they would go at once into the consideration of the bankrupt bill.

Mr. KING said he did not think it was in order to take up a special order until 1 o'clock. He regretted that so much of the time of the Senate was consumed in motions to give preference to some bills, and take them out of their places on the calendar. He hoped the Senate would proceed to the consideration of the general orders as they stood on the calendar.

The question was then taken on the motion of STURGEON, and lost.

The Chair then again resumed the general orders.

Mr. RUGGLES asked that the question might be taken on his motion, which was done, and it was negatived.

The general orders were then taken up, and the bill for the relief Reynell Coates and Walter R. Johnson was considered as in committee of the whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, after explaining the merits of the bill, offered an amendment for the relief of William McMurtrie.

Mr. KING opposed the amendment, and it was lost.

Mr. KING then moved to amend by striking out the amount charged for outfits; which was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CHARTER OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill to amend and continue in force the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, reported the same with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert—

That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia," approved May the fifteenth, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, and the act entitled "An act supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington," passed the twenty-sixth of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, be, and the same are hereby, continued in force for the period of twenty years from the passage of this act, except so far as the same may be inconsistent with, or repealed by, the following provisions, or by any act hereafter to be passed by Congress.

Sec. 2. And be it enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, within two months from the passage of this act, to select and appoint three discreet and sensible men, inhabitants of said city of Washington, as commissioners, whose duty it shall be to lay off and divide said city into six wards, in such manner, and with such bounds and limits, as to secure to each ward, as near as may be, an equal number of inhabitants, and as may be otherwise most convenient to the inhabitants of said city. The said commissioners to have the said wards plainly and distinctly marked and designated upon a plat of said city, which they are to have prepared for the purpose, and to submit said plat and their proceeding to the President of the United States for his approval; and the same, when so approved by him, are to be delivered to the mayor of said city, to be by him filed away and preserved among the archives of said city. And should the said proceedings of the commissioners aforesaid not be approved, he will report the same, with his objections, to Congress, at its next regular session; and, in that event, the operation of this act shall be suspended until the further action of Congress upon the subject; and the said commissioners shall be allowed and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a compensation for their services, to be fixed by the President, but not to exceed the sum of six dollars each per day, for every day they shall be actually employed in the performance of the duty hereby required of them.

SEC. 3. And be it enacted, That the Board of Aldermen for said city shall, after the expiration of terms for which the existing members were chosen, consist of two members from each of said six wards, so as aforesaid to be laid off and ascertained, said members to be residents in, and chosen from each ward, by the qualified voters in each ward respectively, at the time and in the manner now prescribed by law; and the Board of Common Council shall in like manner, after the expiration of the terms for which the existing members were chosen, consist of three members, to be resident in and chosen from each of said six wards respectively, by the qualified voters therein, at the times and in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 4. And be it enacted, That any free white male citizen of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided and had his domicile in the said City of Washington for one whole year immediately preceding any election for Mayor, Aldermen, or Common Councilmen, and who shall have given in his name to the Register of the said City at least twelve months before the election at which he shall offer to vote, to be entered upon the registry of the inhabitants of said City, which it is hereby made the duty of said Register to keep for that purpose, and who shall have paid all taxes lawfully assessed to or upon, and payable by him, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and the neglect or failure of the corporate authorities of said city to levy or assess to or upon any citizen a poll tax or other tax, shall not operate to deprive such citizen of his right of voting at any election in said city.

SEC. 5. And be it enacted, That so much of the acts hereby continued as require any property qualification whatever for the officers of mayor, alderman or common councilman, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; but the persons who may hereafter be chosen for either of those offices, shall respectively be in all other respects qualified as the existing laws require.

SEC. 6. And be it enacted, That the corporate authorities of said city of Washington shall have full power to levy and collect a poll tax from every free white male inhabitant of said city, of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, not exceeding in amount one dollar in any one year.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States being taken up, Mr. CRITTENDEN rose to explain its provisions, but he said he had no intention to enter into an elaborate argument on the subject, for, if a debate were to follow, it would amount to a rejection of the bill at this late period of the session. The bill had been fully debated at the last session, when it was passed, and a protracted debate now was, therefore, unnecessary, as he presumed the opinions of the Senators were in no respect changed. The bill was, in its main features, the same as the bill on which they had heretofore acted; and, after calling the attention of the Senate to a report made by commissioners appointed by the British Crown, who consisted of commissioners in the bankruptcy and insolvent courts, he left the measure to the disposal of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON rose to make a motion which would go to test one principal feature in this bill; it was in relation to the manner in which certificates should be granted to debtors when discharged from their debts. The bill before them provided that the certificate should be decreed and allowed by the court which declared the debtor a bankrupt without the concurrence of the creditors, which differed in that respect from the English bankrupt law, and from all bills which had hitherto been brought into Congress on that subject, by which the assent of a portion of the creditors was always required. Now on this point he proposed to test the Senate, whether they should introduce such an innovation as this bill proposed, and allow judges to decree and allow a certificate on a case made out almost ex parte, and without the consent of the creditors. His motion was to strike out the fourth section, and to insert the forty-second and forty-third sections of the bankrupt bill, which was matured in the Senate in 1827, which, if adopted, would make this essential difference in this bill, that instead of the bankrupt being discharged by the act of the judge without the consent of the creditors, he should not be discharged unless on certain conditions, the principal one of which was, that two-thirds of his creditors, in number and amount, should sign the certificate. With respect to the precise number he was not particular, but he was desirous that some certain number of the creditors should assent thereto. He believed this power was due to the creditor; it was a power which Congress should not undertake to take away; indeed, it was one of the great fundamental principles of the bankrupt bill, which had not hitherto, either in this country or in England been departed from, that the creditors should control the issuing of the certificate, and he (Mr. BENTON) looked upon it that, under our Constitution, which prohibited them from impairing the obligation of contracts, they ought not to deprive the creditor of the just right he had exercised in such cases under similar laws. What could be objected to such a provision? Would it be said that the creditors would be hard hearted, and that, therefore, they would withhold the certificate from a poor debtor who had become so by misfortune, or providence even? Such an argument was contradicted by experience, which taught them that where there was fairness on the part of the debtor towards the creditors, there was almost uniformly generosity to the impoverished and honest debtor on the part of the creditors. It had been the practice for the debtor and the creditors to meet together, and where the debtor showed himself to be honestly indebted, and unable to meet his engagements, he was released; and he (Mr. BENTON) held then that there was nothing in the argument that creditors were heard heard, to object to the substitute which he offered. He therefore moved to strike out the fourth section, and insert the sections he had mentioned.

The Secretary having read the sections proposed to be introduced—

Mr. HUNTINGTON concurred with his friend, the Senator from Kentucky, that if this bill was to be debated section by section, it must be obvious it could not be passed. His own State (Connecticut) had very little interest in this bill, yet he must be permitted to say that he had several objections to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It was a perfect anomaly in all judicial proceedings to require in such cases not only the intervention of a court, but also of two-thirds of the creditors. By the fourth section of this bill, which it was now proposed to strike out, there was ample security provided for the bona fide creditor; the question of fraud was determinable by a court, and why should the consent of two-thirds of the creditors be required, when a court had determined the debtor entitled to his discharge? He could not see why this peculiar privilege should be given to creditors in this case, more than in any other, when they had the opportunity to bring the debtors before a proper tribunal. He saw no reason whatever to place such power in the hands of creditors. He objected to vest creditors with the power to interpose an unjust refusal to the discharge of honest debtors; he had also other objections; but as the measure had been fully debated at the last session, he would not now detain the Senate.

Mr. HUBBARD had considered this bill, and had prepared a motion which he had intended to submit to the Senate, but he presumed the Senator from Missouri had given to it the consideration which it demanded, and, therefore, he should not interfere with the honorable Senator's amendment. The honorable gentleman from Connecticut said a perfect anomaly was involved in that amendment. Now, what was the proceeding to which the amendment referred? A bankrupt was about to be discharged from his liabilities to his creditors, and the bankrupt was allowed to take his own time, and to make his own preparation, and to make the declaration when it suited his own convenience, and the creditors interposed, the Senator from Connecticut said it was an anomaly!

Now, in every bankrupt system with which he [Mr. HUBBARD] was acquainted, it was incorporated; and why should it not be so now? Had not every gentleman's experience warranted him in making the declaration, that where there was one creditor that refused to discharge a debtor, there were ten dishonest debtors that sought to impose upon an honest creditor? He was willing and desirous to give security to the honest debtor, but he would not lose sight of the honest creditor. His State, (New Hampshire,) would, perhaps, be as little affected by a bankrupt bill, as any other—as yet neither he nor his colleague had received a single memorial or remonstrance on the subject—but when they were legislating in this matter, he hoped they would proceed with due care, and not pass a one-sided bill on the community, and neglect to pay a due regard to the interests of creditors. Of what earthly benefit was this fourth section to the creditors? What earthly protection would it afford them? The whole bill from the first to the last was a bill for the exclusive benefit of the debtor, and it did not regard, as he viewed it, the interest of the creditor. He rejoiced that the honorable Senator from Missouri had brought forward his proposition, and he (Mr. HUBBARD) should call for the ayes and noes thereon; but he trusted, in saying what he had now said, he should not be accused of being unmindful of the unfortunate debtor.

Mr. NORVELL hoped the amendment would not be adopted. He would rather see no bankrupt bill pass, than a bill with such a clause as that proposed by the Senator from Missouri. The section of the Constitution to which the Senator from Missouri referred, prohibited the States impairing the obligation of contracts, and did not militate against their power to pass the bill as it was introduced. He regretted to see gentlemen so much behind the age in which they lived in reference to subjects of this kind; if they kept equal pace with the people, they should at once do what justice, and mercy, and humanity called upon them to do.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said the bill provided that if the creditors dissented, it should arrest the judge's granting a certificate, and the matter was to be put upon trial; and if it were then determined that the debtor was a bona fide bankrupt, the judge should grant the certificate, without the concurrence of the creditors. But it was now proposed so to alter it as to make the consent of the creditors indispensable in all cases. Now the mischievous consequences of such power being vested in the creditors was shown in the report of the British commissioners, to which he had before referred, and to an extract from that report he begged to call the attention of the Senate. Having read the extract—

Mr. WRIGHT suggested a modification of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri; his impression was that a majority of the creditors was sufficient, and he hoped his friend would substitute a majority for two-thirds, on whose consent the certificate should be granted. If he understood the question then before the Senate, it was a very important one. The State Legislatures, by the Constitution, could not cancel the obligation of contracts, and the question presented to the Senate was, on what condition they would do it? Should it be entirely without the concurrence or action of the creditors? And if so upon what principle would they proceed. Why was the appeal made to them now? If he understood it, it was that a man may have a great many creditors, and may compound with all but one; and that that one might be incorrigible. But were they prepared to go farther than to say that the debtor should be discharged, when he secured the good will of his creditors in number and value? If he could not procure the consent of a majority, equity would appear to be strong on the side of the creditors. He, however, only rose to suggest a modification of the amendment, which he wished the Senator from Missouri to adopt.

Mr. BENTON accepted the modification.

Mr. MERRICK was in favor of the exercise of the power which Congress possessed to pass an uniform bankrupt law, but there were now but about three weeks remaining of the session, and therefore, whatever labor they might undertake in reference to this bill, it would do no good, for the measure could not be matured. If the bill passed the Senate it could not pass the other branch of Congress, and therefore he looked upon the time which would be consumed in a discussion upon this bill as so much valuable time lost, to the obstruction of other measures which might be matured and passed. He had, therefore, risen to move—and he did it in no spirit of hostility to the bankrupt bill, but to avoid an unnecessary consumption of time—that the whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. NORVELL called for the ayes and noes thereon.

Mr. WRIGHT suggested a change of the motion to one of indefinite postponement. But if the Senator from Maryland persisted in his motion, he should desire permission to say a few words in explanation of the vote he should give, and other Senators might desire the same privilege.

Mr. MERRICK withdrew his motion, to meet the wishes of the Senator from New York.

Mr. WRIGHT then explained that he should vote for an indefinite postponement, because there was no reasonable hope that they could pass a bankrupt bill during the present session; there was not time to do so, for he knew that some days would be required before they could come to a conclusion upon it in this body. When the bill was before them last year, he labored to make it as perfect as the Senate would consent that it should be, and his duty to himself would require that he should try again to make it still more perfect; but at this period of the session he would prefer an indefinite postponement.

Mr. WHITE, after a few words respecting the near approach of the close of the session, and the paucity of business yet received from the other branch of Congress, said he felt inclined to vote for the motion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK] but he should prefer a postponement to a day certain.

Mr. SEVIER hoped the Senate would do one of two things; either lay the bill on the table or go on with it on its merits. They were then wasting their time with a discussion about what motion should be made.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky hoped the Senate would go on with the bill, and discharge its duty to the country, without reference to the other branch of Congress.

Mr. PRESTON did not think the bill could pass; it should not pass by his vote, for he should go against it. There was now much anxiety in the country respecting this measure, and, if it were postponed indefinitely, that agitation would continue. He was ready to vote against the bill; but, as several gentlemen were anxious to take the vote upon it, he hoped it would be such a vote as would quiet the matter with the public.

Mr. BUCHANAN could not, as at present advised, vote for the bill. A few days ago he had said he was willing to give it a fair trial, and he was not prepared, at the present stage, to vote for laying it on the table; he could wait a day or two, but he had not the most distant expectation that it would be passed. In the course of a day or two, he thought the friends of the bill would be satisfied it could not pass, and, therefore, he would suffer them to go on.

Mr. MERRICK said, as there appeared to be a diversity of opinion amongst Senators, he would not persist in his motion.

Mr. BAYARD expressed himself to be opposed to the bill, but he was not willing to vote to lay it on the table.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON's motion as modified on the suggestion of Mr. WRIGHT, and negatived by the following vote—ayes 18, noes 23.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Sever, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bates, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Porter, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White and Williams—23.

Mr. HUBBARD then moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to incorporate in it the following provision, viz:

First. Proper and suitable provisions to embrace all banks and all other trading incorporations in its prospective operation.

Second. Proper and suitable provisions to give the creditors of every bankrupt an opportunity to choose the assignee of the estate, and only authorizing the judge to appoint, when the creditors omit to do so:

Third. Proper and suitable provisions to secure to every bankrupt, when the commission of bankruptcy issues upon the application of creditors, a right to apply to the judge in concurrence with a majority in number and interest of his creditors, to supersede the commission, and to give authority to the judge to grant the application.

Fourth. Proper and suitable provisions to authorize the judge, or court, in bankruptcy, in case any bankrupt shall, pending the proceedings, offer a composition to his creditors which shall be accepted by three-fourths in amount of them, to compel the acceptance of the composition by the remaining fourth in amount of the creditors, or rather to accept it for them, and discharge him.

Fifth. To strike out from the bill all provisions which secure preferences to any class of creditors in any one State, which are not equally preferred by the laws of all the States, and all voluntary preferences by the bankrupt in all cases.

Sixth. Proper and suitable provisions to punish, as felony, any intentional concealment, or withholding of any part of his assets from his assignees by any bankrupt, or the conniving at any fictitious claims against his estate.

Mr. WALKER thought the course of the Senator from New Hampshire a most extraordinary one. While professing he has no intention to delay action on this bill, he submits a motion, which, if successful, will most effectually produce that result. Did not every Senator know that a recommitment of this bill must inevitably postpone the action of this body upon it until so late a period that will place it beyond the reach of the action of the House? Why not propose these amendments separately, and have a vote taken upon them? In the present position of the question, the friends of some of the provisions proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire were embarrassed. He himself was in favor of the amendment proposing to include banks in the provisions of the bill. He had voted for it last session and he would again vote for it; but if the friends of the banks were in a majority on this floor, and refused to subject them to the operations of this law, he was not willing that his constituents should be deprived of the benefits of the bill on that account. He should vote against recommitment as endangering the passage of the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD said he had not made the motion to delay the bill, but because after mature reflection, he thought the provisions he had submitted should be incorporated in any bill passed by Congress on the subject of bankruptcy, and he thought it was not possible there was a majority in that body who were opposed to the second of these proposed amendments—that of giving the creditors a voice in the selection of the assignee of the bankrupt. He could have proposed these amendments separately, but was of opinion that a recommitment of the bill was the shortest mode of accomplishing his purpose.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he was also opposed to the recommitment of the bill as unnecessarily delaying the action of the Senate upon it. He was in favor of some of the provisions proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, but he was most decidedly opposed to that designated by the Senator from Mississippi. He would never consent that his State, or the institutions of his State, should be placed under a commission of bankruptcy. He was opposed to the bill in its present shape, and would vote against it, but was willing that its friends should have it in their power to make such amendments as might render it less objectionable to him and those who thought with him.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he hoped the friends of the bill would vote, not talk. He need not remind them that to delay its passage by debate would as inevitably defeat it as if there was an express vote of the Senate to that effect.

Mr. CALHOUN said he should vote for recommitment, but he was opposed to the proposition to include incorporations. He had spoken, and voted against it at the last session, and he held the same opinions now.

Mr. BENTON said he was in favor of recommitment, and in favor of including incorporations. He was in favor of it thirteen years since, when a bankrupt bill was under consideration in this body, and he had seen nothing since to induce him to change his opinion. He had then voted for it in company with about a dozen other Senators. Among those who had voted in opposition to him was the present President of the United States. That distinguished gentleman has since changed his opinion. The bank suspension of 1837, which was so readily followed by every bank in the Union, and its concomitant evils, had convinced him of the necessity of bringing these institutions under the operations of law. So late as October of last year, he had expressed his sentiments on this subject, in a letter, with a clearness and a candor characteristic of the man. He (Mr. BENTON) would read this, as better than any thing he could say on the subject; and he was sure it would be listened to by the Senate with more pleasure than any remarks of his own. Mr. BENTON then read an extract from the letter of President Van Buren, in the following words:

"It would constitute no objection with me if corporations were, in a proper form, embraced by the provisions of such a bill. An attempt was made at the close of the discussions on the bankrupt bill of 1837, in the Senate, to include banking corporations, by inserting after the word bankers, in the description of the persons who were made subject to the provisions of the bill, the words 'or any banking incorporation.' Assuming that the effect of this amendment, if it prevailed, would be to make the members of such corporations liable, in their individual capacities, to the penalties denounced by the law for acts, in respect to which their charters made them personally irresponsible, I opposed it as an unauthorized interference with State laws. I could not now approve a bill containing provisions liable to such an objection. The disastrous state of things produced by the general suspension of specie payments by the banks in 1837, presented for consideration, in a form which could not with propriety be disregarded, the question whether the power of Congress over the subject of bankruptcy might not be brought to bear upon these institutions in a manner which would clear of that difficulty. Upon a careful examination of the subject, in all its bearings, I was induced to believe that this might be done in a form which, while it afforded relief to the creditors of those institutions, and advanced the public interests, would be neither liable to the objection referred to, nor encroach in any other way upon the rights of the States or transcend the authority of the Federal Government. A provision in a bankrupt law authorizing the bill holders and creditors of all banks, after a specified delay in the payment of their notes in specie, to institute proceedings to cause their affairs to be wound up and their effects to be applied to the payment of their debts, would, in, my judgment, be a measure of that character. Its object and effect would only be to compel them to discharge the obligations they incurred, and the liabilities they were under according to the State laws, by giving to their creditors for this purpose a remedy which Congress alone can effectually confer. The contracts between individuals are also made under the sanction of the laws of the States and regulated by them. Those having claims under these contracts may resort to the State courts to enforce them, as it is also competent for the creditors of banks to do. The object of a bankrupt law would be to furnish the creditor an additional remedy to compel debtors of one description, to do what, under the laws of the State, it is their duty to do. The proposed provision in regard to banks would proceed, although in a modified form, upon the same principle and to the same end, without depriving the corporation or its members of any rights or immunities secured to them by the State laws. Entertaining these views, I brought the subject to the notice of Congress during the suspension of specie payments by the banks, in 1837. If they are correct, it would seem difficult to conceive on what ground the exemption of the banks from the provisions of such a law could be sustained by those who insist on its application to other classes of our citizens. Equal and exact justice, the only proper basis of legislation, requires that laws should extend to, and operate upon all who are fairly within the range of the same policy. Corporations, though artificial bodies, are composed of men, are managed by them, and, like private dealings, have for their main objects the personal advantage of the corporations. The principle which demands their exclusion from the operation of a bankrupt law on the ground of expediency, claims for that portion of our citizens whose property is thus invested, privileges and exemptions denied to others. It proposes to secure to them as creditors all the advantages of such a law, without making them liable under it as debtors. On what principle, I ask, can so marked a preference to one portion of the people over the other be justified? Punctuality on the part of incorporated banks to fulfil their engagements, is of more importance to the community than that of any individual traders; and their failure in performing their duty is attended with much more injurious consequences. If, then, there be no good reason for the distinction on the ground of public interests, most assuredly there can be none on that of claims to favor. The privileges which the laws already give to those institutions, and the limited liability of those who invest property in them, furnish, on the contrary, the strongest reasons against the exemption which is claimed in their behalf.

"Whilst on every dollar so invested the stockholder has a right to loan two, and sometimes three times the amount, and whilst he is shielded from all personal responsibility in case of the failure of the bank to comply with its engagements, no portion of the property of any other class of the community has such artificial value given to it by law nor is it protected, in like manner, from the hazards of business; but on the contrary, every dollar they possess is held subject to the claims of their creditors. These desirable privileges were granted under the expectations of advantages and facilities to the public to be derived from these institutions, not one of which can be realized if they fail to redeem their bills in specie when demanded. Whatever may be thought of their usefulness under other circumstances, all must admit that, if they cease to perform this important function, they are the sources of great mischief. The reasons, therefore, for giving to the bill holders and other creditors, whose confidence has been in some measure obtained under a sort of legislative guarantee, full and prompt remedies against them, in case of failure to perform their engagements, are stronger than in cases of ordinary debtors. Should a bankrupt law be passed which did not embrace corporations, having the right as creditors to avail themselves of its advantages, individuals who failed in personally performing their contracts with them might, by their interference, be arrested in their business, and have their property at once transferred to assignees. More than this, they might be involved in acts of bankruptcy by the failure of the banks themselves to fulfil their promises to them, or to others, on whose punctuality their own depended. The injustice of the distinction in this view of the subject becomes strikingly clear, and I am wholly at a loss to know on what ground it could be upheld. This is not a mere speculation upon remote impossible contingencies. Had there been a bankrupt law in existence for the last three or four years, thousands of our fellow-citizens would have been subjected to its provisions by reason of the delays any difficulties they experienced in realizing the demands due to them, resulting indirectly from the suspension of payments by the banks, whilst against the banks themselves they, and their debtors who held their notes or other obligations, would have been comparatively remediless.

"The States have certainly not been sparing in bestowing upon these institutions special privileges, and it has not been heard, as matter of complaint, that they have been too vigorous in enforcing a strict compliance with the conditions on which the grants were made. It is not easy to comprehend the extent to which this principle might be carried in exempting traders as well as bankers from responsibility to this remedy for a non-performance of their engagements, and in enlarging the sphere of legislative privileges. The State Legislatures have been in the constant habit of incorporating manufacturing, and, in some forms, commercial companies also, each of whom become traders of the first class. If these companies, in addition to the particular advantages and personal immunities secured to them, are also to have their effects exempted from liability under bankrupt laws, the efficacy and value of the constitutional provision on the subject of bankruptcy may be effectually superseded, whilst those who are not possessed of sufficient influence to become the participants of legislative favor, would remain subject to the utmost rigor of the laws that may be passed under it. While I would carefully abstain from interfering with the rights of these corporations, derived from State authority, I would not add to their privileges by exempting them altogether from the operation of a general bankrupt law, when such exemption would, in many cases, operate injuriously upon individuals subject to its provisions. The corporations themselves act, in my judgment, most unwisely, when they insist upon an exemption which could not fail to mark yet more distinctly the line of separation between their affairs and those of the community at large, and to give still greater prominence to the superior advantages they enjoy over the rest of their fellow-citizens."

Mr. BENTON said he adopted these remarks as a part of his argument on this subject, and on this occasion he should say but little in addition. As for the apprehension that the rights of the States would be affected by the adoption of such an amendment, he said it would be to the advantage of the States not to set up a claim to rights where they have none. They have no right to destroy the currency of the Constitution. They have no right to make any thing but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts. They can neither do this themselves, nor can they allow others to do so. Nor do they do this. No State gives any such power to these incorporations, but in many of the States it is provided in the charters granted by them that a refusal to meet their engagements on the part of the banks, works a forfeiture of their charters. And by provision bringing banks under the operation of this law, we are co-operating with the States in their efforts to preserve a sound currency. As banks we have nothing to do with them, as bankrupts we seize them. He alluded to the great number of incorporations in some of the States. In Massachusetts there were upwards of a thousand, embracing every species of business of which the mind of man was capable. The companies comprised some ten, some twenty, some one hundred persons. Here is an immense proportion of our population which will be exempt from the operations of this law, and what will be the result of this condition of things? Why may we go into our Legislatures, and get acts of incorporation for every species of business, even for growing corn, in order to shield themselves from the operation of law. And is the Senate prepared to establish privileged classes in this country, to exempt from the operation of laws, and that class whose means would enable them to spend much of their time in attendance upon the Legislature in furthering their interests? Are we to establish a privileged order in this country, as in Great Britain, where a peer of the realm is liable to arrest? What have we seen of the banking incorporations within the last forty years? We have seen two suspensions, comprising all the banks of the Union, and another embracing more than one-half the banks of the Union. We have seen them hold their Congresses, and debating whether they would pay their debts or not, and whenever there was proposition to pay there was a great deal of hollowness, but there was no difficulty at all in getting them to agree to a continuance of the suspension. Even at this moment we know that nearly all banks in the Western country have held a convention, and have separated without fixing upon a time for a resumption of payment. The bankrupt law would be the best means of correcting this. If when an insolvent institution failed to fulfil her engagements, affairs were taken out of the hands of her directors, and placed in commission for the benefit of her creditors, her neighbors would take care how they would follow her example. Suspensions in this country would become a familiar operation. We have had two, and we will have a third whenever it suits the interests or the political designs of those concerned in these institutions. He instanced the case of the Bank of the United States, two-thirds of whose stock was owned by foreigners. This institution was above the reach of law, and violated her obligations with impunity, while she had her remedy against those indebted to her. This foreign institution can crush our finances either in peace or war, as it suits the designs of her owners. The banks of this country have been strong enough, but unwise enough heretofore to defeat every effort to infuse strength into the system; and what has been the consequence? They were losing the confidence of the country. There was scarcely one of them whose stock was not below par, and some of them at 50 per cent. depreciation. They were treading down in their tracks, and would do so, if there was some measure adopted which would enable the public to distinguish between the sound and insolvent institutions. Mr. BENTON concluded by observing that he considered the adoption of a motion to include incorporations, as a measure alike essential to the welfare of the public, and to the existence of the solvent banks themselves.

A motion was now made for adjournment; which, after some opposition, was carried, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 4, 1841.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. SHEPARD, being entitled to the floor, pressed his great reluctance to take part in the discussion; but as doctrines had been advanced dangerous tendency, he felt constrained to express his opinions on the various topics which had been discussed.

Mr. S. then entered into a review of the tariff question, showing the advantages which the manufacturing interests of the North derived from the existing law in relation to importations, while the planting States paid a heavy tax on the articles which they received in exchange for their staple commodities. He endeavored to demonstrate that the manufacturing interest was the favorite child of the Government, and had the superior advantage of the home as well as of the foreign market. He also contended that the restrictive principle was the malaria of commerce, and, when taken off, every thing flourished.

After some remarks in relation to the tobacco interest of this country, Mr. S. proceeded to notice the proposed scheme for a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

It had been avowed by persons in authority that the deficiency in the revenues arising from the distribution, was to be supplied by a tax on wines and silks. This was to prepare the way for a distribution. But the public lands were the common property of the whole people, and if the public lands could be divided, then any other property belonging to the General Government might also be divided. The General Government was appointed for national purposes, and when Congress had power to dispose of the public lands, it was for national and not for local purposes.

Mr. S. then proceeded to show the inconsistency of the supporters of the distribution scheme. He referred to Pennsylvania as an instance of its effects. That State would receive, as her share of the public lands, about three hundred thousand dollars. But, on the other hand, Pennsylvania would be taxed to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars. What would be gained then? It would be giving with one hand, and taking back with the other. But, said Mr. S. here comes the grand argument that the rich will be taxed, and not the poor. Well, let that be admitted; but why not let Pennsylvania tax the rich herself? She could do it much more effectually than we, and at much less expense. No advantage could be gained then by this giving away and taking back system. Besides, it would convert the General Government into a tax gatherer for the States, and would tend to the ultimate destruction of its powers. This would not be all, for whom the system of giving away should be once commenced, there would be no knowing when it would end. The great contest of parties in Congress would then be, which should give away most to the people. It would not stop here, for the next step would be to give away the money out of the State Treasuries.

But was this the time for giving away? Let any man look at the advancing steps over the world of our rival, Great Britain, and then let him answer the question. Look at that power, not satisfied with Asia, but getting possession of, or controlling, one of the richest empires of the world. And how was she doing this? Why, by her immense navy. Yet, in the face of all this, a proposition was made to give away our public land; to dissipate our strength for the mere purpose of carrying out the petty objects of party. Although he did not apprehend an immediate war, yet the day when we might be precipitated into hostilities with that great power no man could tell. Economist as he was, therefore, he would earnestly urge the condition of our navy on the attention of Congress. For he was convinced that if our navy remained as it was, we could not long remain as a great nation.

The remarks of Mr. S. will be given in extenso hereafter.

Mr. JAMES GARLAND then gave his views on the various topics which had been introduced into the debate. As for the bill itself, he thought he should, although reluctantly, vote in its favor.

After speaking at some length in relation to the tariff question, Mr. G. expressed his disapprobation of these petty struggles of party, when the signs of the times showed that there was an absolute necessity for a concentration of all our strength. He here alluded to the daring ambition of Great Britain, and the precautions necessary to be observed by us to prevent aggression from so formidable a rival. He saw the danger in the distance, and, for one, raised his voice in favor of preparation.

Mr. ADAMS then obtained the floor, and expressed his intention to vote for the bill. It was not for him, at that time, to discuss the means by which the Treasury had been brought into its present condition; but, as the deficiency did exist, he was willing to supply it, not from any party considerations, but because he held it right that the Government should have means to pay its debts.

Mr. A. then proceeded to argue that the means of repaying these Treasury notes, with interest thereon, ought to have been provided for by the bill. This, however, had always been omitted; and when Treasury notes were asked for, the means of repaying them had always been neglected. It had been put off from time to time, and it was against that omission he now raised his voice. He would never, so far as he was concerned, issue notes in any form, whether skinplasters, bonds, or otherwise, without providing means of paying them. He would never issue a single dollar without providing means for paying that dollar. As regarded the mode of relieving the Treasury at the present time, he would not say but that, in case they had the majority in both Houses, he would not have preferred a regular loan.

Mr. A. then proceeded to condemn the course pursued by some members in discussing the measures of the coming Administration beforehand, when it could not possibly be known what course General Harrison would think proper to pursue. Gentlemen had been discussing the subject of an extra session, a National Bank, the public lands, and other measures, when they did not know the opinion of the President elect. What, he would ask, was the use of debating on the propriety of calling an extra session, when they could not tell whether Gen. Harrison would think proper to call one or no? The President was authorized to convene Congress, when he should deem it expedient. It all depended upon his opinion; therefore what manner of good could result from a discussion at this time, on such a measure, when they had no means of knowing what the views of the President would be? But the House had been doing what was done in private life: they had been settling the affairs of the nation; they had been talking about the next Administration, the new cabinet, and so on; in fact, they had all been cabinet makers. That being the case, however, he was rather surprised that cabinet makers should have shown so little mercy to the manufacturers of the North.

Mr. A. then proceeded to notice a newspaper rumor to the effect that Mr. Wise was to be the leader of the Whig party in the House under the new Administration.

This drew out Mr. WISE in repeated explanations, and the debate merged into one of an unpleasant character, involving the merits of the anti-duelling law, &c.

Mr. WISE replied at some length to the remarks of Mr. ADAMS, so far as they concerned him personally.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON then obtained the floor, and pending his remarks the committee rose.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN,
The House adjourned.

NOTE.—In the remarks of Mr. COLES on the tobacco question, he is represented as urging the necessity of the protection of that interest. He advocated the propriety of continuing our negotiations, and endeavored to demonstrate the absurdity and evil consequences of attempting to protect that interest by countervailing duties.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, February 5, 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a report from the Secretary of War, containing the accounts of disbursements among the Indians for the year ending 30th September, 1840; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, transmitting additional reports in reference to the construction of the Potomac aqueduct; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented memorials from citizens of Wayne, Ottawa, and Oakland counties, of the State of Michigan, praying the passage of a general bankrupt law; which were laid on the table.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, relative to harbors; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition of citizens of Illinois and Iowa, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a letter from the Board of Commissioners of Pilots of the city of New York, transmitting a copy of the laws of New York on the subject of pilots; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river.

Also, a memorial of the same body, relative to a survey of the public lands north of the Wisconsin river.

Also, a memorial from the same body, relative to the improvement of certain rivers in Wisconsin Territory.

The memorials were severally ordered to be printed, and appropriately referred.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, asking that a portion of swamp lands, which have been returned as not worth the expense of survey, may be transferred to the State; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the same body relative to the sale of fractional section; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. L. also presented the petition of Richard Phillips; and

The memorial of the heirs of Joseph Decille, severally praying the confirmation of titles to tracts of land; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WHITE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize John E. Metcalfe and others to locate certain pre-emption claims to lands in the State of Indiana; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Isaac Garrison, asked to be discharged from its further consideration. Mr. H. said it was not intended by this motion to prejudice the claim hereafter, but merely because there was an insufficiency of evidence at present to authorize the committee to bring in a bill. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of causing to be built a steam frigate under the sole direction of the American naval constructor, Foster Rhodes.

Mr. W. also submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not deemed incompatible with the public interest, the correspondence, if any, between the State Department and the representatives of any foreign Government relative to the negroes taken on board the L'Amistad, which has occurred since that transmitted with his message of the 21st March, 1840.

Mr. WALL submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish a copy of the reports made on Colt's improved repeating fire arms in October and December, 1840, by a board of navy officers appointed for their examination.

Also, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish a copy of the report made in July, 1840, by a board of army officers, on the repeating fire arms manufactured by Mighill Nutting.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for the relief of Reynell Coates an Walter R. Johnson, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Paxson was taken up on its third reading,

And after a debate, in which Messrs. YOUNG, KING, and CALHOUN participated, it was read a third time and passed.

Mr. MERRICK then moved that the Senate would postpone the orders of the day, and take up the joint resolution directing the transfer to the State of Maryland of the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, standing in the name of the United States, upon certain conditions.

Mr. SEVIER hoped the Senator would not press the consideration of this resolution at the present time. This devoting the morning hour to favorite measures to the exclusion of private claims, overriding all the bills on the calendar, was a practice to which he was not willing to submit.

Some time was consumed in repeatedly taking the question in order to ascertain the sense of the Senate, when it was finally determined in favor of taking up the joint resolution.

So the resolution was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole; and, after a discussion, in which Messrs. MERRICK, CLAYTON, HUBBARD, WRIGHT, YOUNG, TAPPAN, SEVIER, PHELPS, HUNTINGTON, BAYARD, BUCHANAN, KNIGHT, and CLAY of Kentucky, participated, it was amended so as to make the consent of the cities of the District necessary to the transfer of their respective portions of the stock, and was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, February 5, 1841.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. LINCOLN submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the bill of this House, (No. 598,) entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," was taken up in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the 18th day of January last, and has been under discussion to this time; and whereas much of the indispensable public business is yet to be acted on; therefore,

Resolved, That after three o'clock to-day, the debate on this bill shall cease, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the various amendments submitted, and to be submitted, and then report the bill, with the amendments agreed to by the committee, to the House.

Objection being made to the reception of the resolution,

Mr. LINCOLN moved a suspension of the rules, and thereupon called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 112, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Blackwell, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Sampson H. Butler, John Campbell, William B. So the rules were suspended.

At the request of several gentlemen,

Mr. LINCOLN modified his resolution, so as to extend the time to seven o'clock, and called for the previous question, which was seconded.

The question now being on the main question,

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, the question being on the motion of Mr. BARNARD to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday. He said he had, from the commencement, been opposed to the entire debate, because he thought he saw, from the beginning, that no good could arise. He contended that it was the design of the present party in power to throw the responsibility of every important measure on the coming Administration. It was his firm conviction that the present party in power had no intention of acting definitely upon any great question of the day.

After some further remarks, Mr. J. said he did not feel disposed to go into a debate on the merits of the bill before the committee, for the reason that he had previously given his views against the system of Treasury notes. He had gone against it because he viewed the whole as clearly unconstitutional; and more especially as the Constitution pointed distinctly to other modes of meeting the exigencies of Government.

Mr. J. then proceeded briefly to notice the proposition of Mr. BARNARD, in relation to a tariff on wines, silks, &c. He considered it as wise policy, and were he assured that the House was in a proper spirit to hear an argument on that subject, he would deem it his duty to make one. As a matter of justice to the gentleman from New York, he (Mr. J.) would say, that the impression of some Southern gentlemen that the proposition had been prepared in the dark, was erroneous. He would state that the proposition was made on the responsibility of the gentleman [Mr. BARNARD] alone, without any secret preparation on the part of his Northern friends.

Mr. J. then proceeded to give his views in relation to various matters, which had been incidentally introduced into the debate.

During the remarks of Mr. J. several members rose in explanation of what they had said in relation to the compromise act, &c.

Mr. CUSHING referred to what he had said on Saturday last in explanation of the views of his State on the subject of a protective tariff, &c.

Mr. LINCOLN said: That explanation of the gentleman may do for his own constituents, but I wish it to be distinctly understood that it does not apply to mine.

Mr. RAYNER followed, and observed that his only apology for entering into the debate was, that he seldom occupied the time of the House; for he considered silence a great virtue.

Mr. R. then proceeded to say that he should vote against the issue of Treasury notes, but in favor of the proposition of Mr. BARNARD to lay a tariff on wines, silks, &c. and also in favor of the proposition for a loan. He viewed the Treasury note system as a means only of protracting the day of payment, and, at some length, went on to show the superior advantages which, in his opinion, would be derived from a direct loan.

He then argued that the deficit in the Treasury was a permanent, and not a mere temporary one; and, if Congress made all the appropriations which were absolutely necessary for the support of Government, that deficit would not be less than ten millions.

Mr. R. then proceeded to criticize the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to contend that the latter had proved himself more of a knave than a fool. He contended that the report was deceitful, and merely got up just as the Secretary was going out of office, to make a show of economy.

Mr. R. next adverted to the subject of an extra session, the Florida war, the pension list, the compromise act, the tobacco interest, &c.

He next argued in favor of an increase of our naval force, the building of steam ships, &c. so that we might be prepared for any aggression from Great Britain. But in order to do that we must have money, and to raise money it would be necessary to adopt the proposition of Mr. BARNARD.

Mr. R. then proceeded to give his views in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. In the course of his remarks on this head, he expressed his astonishment at the course taken by Mr. WISE in opposing the distribution system as an absurdity. He (Mr. R.) had always always considered that the principle of a distribution was one of the cardinal points of Whig doctrine.

Alluding to the arguments of Mr. WISE against an extra session, Mr. R. desired to know if that gentleman was willing to permit the Sub Treasury law to remain in operation until the next regular session. He was surprised at the expressions of that gentleman against the calling of an extra session. But should an extra session be called, the gentleman might be assured that his [Mr. W.'s] speech would be taken as a text book for every Loco Foco in the House. The gentleman had said that an extra session would be imprudent under the present state of excitement of the public mind. He (Mr. R.) was sorry the gigantic mind of the gentleman had come to that conclusion.

Mr. REYNOLDS assured the committee that the distance between two ends of his rod on this subject would be very short indeed. Yes, they might be assured that his song on this bill would be very short indeed. He hoped his humble self would be permitted, however, to say a few words in dissent from the remarks of his friend who had just sat down.

Mr. R. after some humorous observations in reply to Mr. RAYNER, in respect to the Florida war and the late New Jersey contested election case, alluded to the proscription which, it was said, would distinguish the coming Administration, and maintained that it was right; for, said he, if my friend was about to establish a Catholic church, would he put a Presbyterian or a Mormon at the head of it? Certainly not.

As to Treasury notes, Mr. R. said he would rather vote for ten millions than for five; but as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—divested of all party spirit—had come to the conclusion that the amount provided for by the bill would be sufficient, he would vote for it, although, as he had said, he would prefer voting for a larger sum. Mr. R. said gentlemen seemed to think it a dishonor not to have an overflowing Treasury, but he would always prefer a depletion to a surplus. It was no dishonor to have a weak Treasury and a strong and powerful people. The money was in the people's pockets, and with it they were exerting their industrial energies; and it was far better for them to have the money than pile it up in the Treasury. As to the State of Illinois, she had this year produced immense crops of wheat and corn, and such had been the case all over the West. The country, he said, was doing better than it had heretofore done. We heard, it is true, a great cry for relief, but it came from those who would not work; from those who sit before store doors on boxes, and, when it is hot weather, move into the shade, and in cold weather bask in the sunshine. These were the men who were continually crying out for "change!"

And are we (said Mr. R.) to be terrified with a few Treasury notes? No, sir! Our honor and character are pledged for their redemption; and they may be redeemed sooner, perhaps, than the holders wish. In our country, our pre-emption men and squatters, as they are here called, seek with great avidity after them; they are as good as gold dust.

Then we cannot hesitate to issue Treasury notes. Mr. R. then entered into a defence of Levi Woodbury, from the charges that had been made against him as to his course during the suspension of 1837, insisting that because he obeyed his oath to support the laws of the land, he was condemned for doing what he could not avoid. Mr. R. also referred to the allusion of his friend from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] as to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury being characterized by fraud, and said that the country would justify the report, as it showed wherein our prosperity consisted, viz: in the exportations of the country, and the energies of the people.

Mr. R. remarked that a great deal had been said about public lands; and he thought it his duty to say that he would do his utmost to get through the House the pre-emption bill, just passed by the Senate. If it was a subject of which the people knew nothing, he would have no objection to a debate upon it; but as it had been up for forty years, he did not consider discussion necessary. Democrats, he knew, would vote for it like a book. For himself, he went for the log cabin men, because they go for the country both in war and in peace. Let it be understood (said Mr. R.) that it is for the honest poor man we legislate, and if I were to indulge in legislation for the rich especially, I would not dare go home to my constituents. Notwithstanding all that had been said upon the subject, the object of Government is a revenue from the public lands, and we needed it more now than at any other time. The pre-emption system, in his opinion, was the most reasonable course ever pursued; the man who put his family on the land, and cultivated it, ought to be preferred—because, by so doing, he comes nearer an actual settler than by any other mode. As a widow, even, could settle on the public land, let her do it as a pre-emption lady. She might get a husband, and become a married lady by doing so. There had also been a talk that aliens ought not to purchase the land. Now in our country (said Mr. R.) we go on a more liberal system than people do in any part of the world. Aliens settle on the land, and by our laws can transmit it to their children. Aliens, too, voted at the elections in Illinois. Under the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of Illinois, they had a right to vote. In that State such had been the practice for twenty years past. The Constitution of Illinois provided that in all elections, male white inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, who had resided six months in the State, were qualified electors. The Constitution of the United States had these remarkable words: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the PEOPLE of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Mr. R. after some explanation as to the intention of the framers of the Constitution of the United States in respect to this passage, concluded by saying that there was no power in the General Government which said that a State shall not regulate its own Government.

Mr. STEENROD said that he was desirous of addressing the House on the various topics which had been introduced into this discussion; but as his colleague [Mr. MALLORY] had recently taken his seat, and had evinced a disposition to address the committee, he would, with pleasure, yield the floor to him, as the limited time now remaining, before the bill would be taken out of committee, would not allow them both to occupy the floor.

Mr. MALLORY, after some brief remarks by way of apology for obtruding himself upon the committee at that late hour, observed that his main object in rising was to notice the remarks of the gentlemen from North Carolina and Maryland [Messrs. RAYNER and JENIFER] in relation to the course pursued by his honorable colleague from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

The gentleman from Maryland, in his speech a few days ago, had said that the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] were none of them in unison with the doctrines of his Whig friends.

Now, observed Mr. M. I do not intend to be read out of school by the gentleman from Maryland; but I take this occasion to say that, with one exception, I fully approve, endorse, and intend widely to circulate, the speech of my honorable colleague, [Mr. WISE.]

Yes, said Mr. M. the ground on which my honorable colleague has placed himself is the ground on which we Harrison men, in Virginia, intend to rally. When I entered the Harrison party I did not intend to compromise my principles; and I will further say, that if those principles on which I and my honorable colleague [Mr. WISE] have taken our stand, are not to be the principles of the administration of General Harrison, then I say that we and the people of Virginia have been grossly deceived.

The doctrines laid down in the speech of my honorable colleague are doctrines which I will maintain, and by which I will stand or fall.

But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] has said that the remarks of my colleague are "ominous," etc. Now I ask that gentleman to say what are the principles avowed by my colleague in his speech which he has not always avowed? I beg to assure the gentleman that the principles of my colleague are the principles of the Whigs of Virginia, if they are not the principles of the Whigs in North Carolina.

But what, said Mr. M. has my colleague advanced that is contrary to the principles of the coming Administration?

Is a National Bank to be one of the leading measures of the coming Administration? And did not General Harrison say that he would not resort to a National Bank if it were not absolutely necessary? My colleague said the same thing.

Is it the tariff question to which the gentleman alludes? Well, I understood General Harrison to avow that he was in favor of standing by the compromise; and my colleague said the same thing. Also, in regard to internal improvement, he took the same ground.

I will repeat, therefore, said Mr. M. that if the principles avowed by my colleague are not to be the principles of the approaching administration of General Harrison, then we are ourselves greatly deceived, and we have deceived others.

But the gentleman from North Carolina said he was pained and surprised at the course of my colleague in his remarks on the measures of the coming Administration; also that he thought my colleague might have waited at least until General Harrison should have arrived in this city. Now, said Mr. M. why did not other gentlemen, who spoke before him, adopt the same plan? I will undertake to say that my colleague would have waited until the arrival of General Harrison, if other gentlemen had thought proper to do the same. But such had not been the case. Other gentlemen had given their views without reserve, and he and his colleague were not going to permit public opinion to be pre-judged, even if the indications did come from a high quarter.

Mr. M. then proceeded to notice the subject of an extra session. The brief time remaining for him to speak would not allow him to enter into a regular argument, but he would fire a few shots at random. For his part, he was opposed to a called session. He was opposed to it on the "let alone" principle. It would be extremely injudicious and unwise in the present state of public feeling to think of such a measure. The body politic was sick, but he did not believe it labored under any serious organic disease. It was sick, however, and it wanted rest in order to recover from its recent fever and excitement. In its present feverish state it would be extremely imprudent to add additional excitement. The proper way for its recovery to a proper and healthy tone, would be to avoid all stimulation. Let it be left alone for a while, and it would restore itself. He believed the elements of prosperity were still to be found in the country, and if allowed time, would soon settle down into order. But for his part he was unwilling to reagentate them so soon by a called session. He was unwilling to pass through another summer of political turmoil. They wanted rest, and if they expected to do well, they must have it.

How could the advocates of a called session expect that General Harrison, immediately on coming into power, should, without proper time for examination and reflection, precipitate himself into great measures. No: the proper plan would be to allow General Harrison time to look around him, and to examine into the true state of affairs before he acted. Above all, he (Mr. M.) was against placing General Harrison in a condition where he would be compelled to commit himself to the scheme of any man.

But he (Mr. M.) would call the attention of the committee to one striking inconsistency. The gentleman from North Carolina had been speaking earnestly about economy, but the first step he had advocated was a called session, which would take three or four hundred thousand dollars from the public Treasury!

He Mr. M. did not believe a called session was necessary. He believed that when General Harrison came into power he would act on the plan of reform and retrenchment. And if gentlemen who had, for the last two or three years been talking about reform and retrenchment, would now act upon that system themselves, there would be no necessity for incurring the expense of a called session.

But much had been said about the deficiency in the Treasury at this time. Several gentlemen had given their ideas on the subject, but from the different results to which they arrive, it was obvious that none of them could tell what the real deficiency was. For instance, one gentleman had set it down at seven millions, while another had come to the conclusion that it was forty millions. Now, here was a difference between two gentlemen only, of thirty-three millions.

It was, therefore, evident that the real deficiency in the Treasury could not be now ascertained. Of what earthly use could it be, then, to have a called session for the purpose of raising a loan, when it could not be known what amount they would require. How was it possible that in the short period elapsing between the time General Harrison came into power, and the expected session, that the real condition of the matter could be examined, so as to ascertain what would be necessary?

In the present state of affairs, he was opposed to a loan, for he believed that, should one be authorized, it would remain a permanent debt upon the Government for years to come. He was in favor of the present bill, although at the last Congress he had voted against the issue of Treasury notes. At the last Congress, when they were asked, he was against them, because he believed they were intended for a circulation. But now, when the present Administration was going out of power, he would vote for them as a temporary expedient, and as a temporary expedient alone.

He (Mr. M.) was opposed to a called session for any purpose whatever, either for raising revenue, or any thing else. He believed a called session would inevitably precipitate them into the great questions of a National Bank, the tariff, and other matters. Now he was averse to this. He wished the people of this country to have proper time for reflection, before they acted on so important a question as a revision of the tariff.

I would advise you, said Mr. M. instead of loaning the banks money, by laying taxes on the people, to study retrenchment and reform. I would say to General Harrison, study this book, (the Blue Book.) I would advise him to study the speeches of the gentlemen from Ohio, (Bond's,) Pennsylvania, (Ogle's) and Vermont, which inculcate reform.

But gentlemen had now nothing to say about retrenchment and reform. The cry was now "money!" "money!" "money!" Yes gentlemen must have "money," and to get money, they must raise the taxes.

So, from present indications, notwithstanding all the past cry of retrenchment and reform, it was evident that nothing was to be saved by the change. All they had gained, it appeared by the turn of the political wheel, was to put out one set of charlatans, and put in another set.

Mr. M. then proceeded to say that if the success of North Carolina was to be used as an argument for consolidation, much as he mourned over his good old State of Virginia, he would prefer the good old mother with all her faults.

The gentleman, said Mr. M. has talked about the "abstractions" of my colleague. But I will tell that gentleman, that if it be an abstraction to oppose a high tariff—if it be an abstraction to oppose a distribution of the public lands, when in the very language of the gentleman, the Treasury is empty, then I tell the gentleman that I also am an abstractionist.

But, continued Mr. M. I wish the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] to understand, that I do not intend to be read out of church by him notwithstanding. I labored as ardently in the cause of General Harrison as that gentleman did, and I intend to support the administration of General Harrison as far as I can. But if that Administration shall not square with the promises and pledges which I conceive it has given to the country, why then I cannot go with that Administration. But I will also say, that if the coming Administration should even pursue a course contrary to my expectations, I shall not regret that I have lent my aid in the elevation of General Harrison. For if his election accomplish nothing else, it has had the effect of breaking down party trammels with us in the South; and henceforward, we shall be able to meet, not on men, but on great principles.

He, Mr. M. could not but admire the eulogium which the gentleman [Mr. RAYNER] had passed upon the gentleman from South Carolina. He had, however, talked a good deal about star gazing, and about people shaking their heads against a lamp post. But he, Mr. M. would tell the gentleman, that there were more times for star gazing than one. He would ask the gentleman not to look too much to the bright horizon before him, and in looking at the wants of the President elect, not to forget "home." Let him look at the storm ahead; the storm which would certainly grow out of this discussion at home. And when that storm should burst upon them, it would sweep away from the ocean many a gallant bark that now sailed proudly before the breeze.

Mr. M. then proceeded to say that he had no fears for the coming Administration of General Harrison. He believed that great man would draw around him persons of talent, who would aid him in ascertaining the true state of the country, and men who would be able to make a true exposition of its affairs. He had not the least doubt, neither, but that General Harrison would have ample means to carry on the Government, if he should, as he, Mr. M. had no doubt, carry on a system of retrenchment and reform. A great saving could be effected by a different administration of the various departments. In the collection of the revenue alone, he believed that from five to eight hundred thousand dollars a year might be saved by a proper administration of the Treasury Department.

Also in the administration of the War Department he believed almost enough could be saved to pay the expenses of the Florida war.

Do you with your internal improvement, said Mr. M.—down with your distribution, (for I think the President elect is not in favor of carrying on internal improvement at the expense of the General Government,) pursue a system of retrenchment, and then I think there can be no doubt that General Harrison will soon save money enough to pay all the debts of this Government.

But, said Mr. M. I protest in advance against any man, or any set of men, undertaking to commit General Harrison to any political scheme. General Harrison was elected on the "one term" principle; but if that principle is to result in this, that the President, instead of acting for the public good, is to be used to bolster up the schemes of one, why, I had almost said, he had better be President for life.

Mr. M. went on to say that he found fault with no Whig in the House for expressing himself in relation to internal improvements, the tariff, or National Bank or other measures. He was willing to hear all that gentlemen might have to say, and expected to be heard in return, without being proscribed for so doing.

But what did they see? Why, his colleague [Mr.

Wise] the other day had given his views on these great measures; had avowed his opinions; when lo! gentlemen rose and expressed their suspicions that he was about to quit the party. This was wrong. Let every man express his opinions, without thereby subjecting himself to the suspicion, that by so doing he was about to leave the party.

Mr. JENIFER here made an explanation to the effect that he had said nothing about Mr. WISE being about to desert his party.

Mr. WISE asked whether the gentleman from Maryland had any distrust of him.

Mr. JENIFER made some reply, which could not be heard.

Mr. WISE. Well, then, I suppose the gentleman takes it for granted that the party will go with him, when at the same time, who knows what the measures of General Harrison will be. Were there not some gentleman making principles for General Harrison before he came into power? But when it was not known what the principles of the coming administration would be, how could it be said that he was about to desert his party? He (Mr. W.) did not take the gentleman from Maryland as the administration.

After some further explanations between himself and Mr. JENIFER,

Mr. WISE observed that had it not been for other gentlemen expressing their views, what they would do, etc. he would never have said a word. But as every member on the floor, who had previously spoken, had given his views in relation to the coming Administration, he thought it was as fair for one as for another. And as others had administered their little nostrums for the cure of the disease, he, although not a regular physician, thought he would do so too.

Mr. MALLORY then resumed his remarks, and observed that at the very outset he had been taunted by the gentleman from Maryland as not being one of the party. They had also been taunted the other day with not having common schools in Virginia. But if they had not common schools, they had schools in Virginia which enabled them to understand signs, as well as other people. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MONROE] had talked also about the "abstractions" of Virginia. Now he would tell that gentleman, that with all their "abstractions," they had common sense enough to get a steamboat below a bridge before they built it up. Mr. M. here related an amusing anecdote, where some common school people of the North built a bridge in such a way as to prevent their getting out a steamboat; (a member at the Reporter's elbow suggested that it was similar to the mason who built his leg in a chimney.)

Mr. M. after some further remarks in relation to the tariff, etc. observed that as the time for discharging the committee from the bill was now at hand, he must conclude.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that some of his friends had regretted this manifestation of difference of opinion among members of the Whig party on this floor. Now, for his part, he was rejoiced at it. It must come at some time, and the sooner the better. Let us know what our friends think of it, (said Mr. U.) let them consider it, and be prepared for future events. But if the separation comes, let us part like friends—let us not attempt to bind ourselves together by a rope of sand, for that will not bind us together as firmly as we ought to be.

In relation to the propriety of a called session, Mr. U. asked, who had been authorized to speak for General Harrison? Had any one? No! Then who brought it forward? Who endorsed it for the Whig party? It was, in his opinion, the mere expression of gentlemen as to the propriety of such a measure. It remained for General Harrison, when he should be inducted into office, to ascertain whether this or that object could be accomplished by an extra session.

Mr. U. considered the intimation of a called session as utterly premature. It ought to be decided when all the elections shall have taken place. Gen. Harrison could then judge, from the elements of Congress, what could or could not be done. Mr. U. said that if he were the President of the United States, and could see that a National Bank could be established, the Sub-Treasury law repealed, the proceeds of the public lands distributed, the tariff revised, &c. and had an assurance to that effect, he would convene Congress instantly to act on that emergency.

[Mr. SMITH of Indiana here read from the Constitution of the United States that part which says that the President "may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them," and asked Mr. U. whether the "emergency" contemplated by the Constitution depended on the preponderance of one or other of the political parties of the country.]

Mr. U. said he would answer what constituted an emergency. Any matter of great public concern in the affairs of the nation, was an emergency. Suppose the President wished war to be declared, and desired Congress to act upon the subject. Suppose one Congress will not act upon it, and the next would. Ought it not to be taken into view whether he would call Congress together or not? The present emergency (he said) grew out of a depreciated bank currency, the want of a uniform currency, and the embarrassed condition in which the States were placed. And in acting upon this emergency, the President ought to take into consideration the elements which would constitute the next Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said, that the gentleman from Kentucky had well characterized the Whig party as being held together by a rope of sand. He could not have given a more happy illustration. Mr. S. in a humorous manner, was alluding to the beautiful specimens of cohesion of the Federal party in Maine and Massachusetts, when

The CHAIR announced that the hour of seven having arrived, further debate would not be in order.

The question first in order was on the motion of Mr. BARNARD to strike out the enacting clause.

Which, being taken, was decided in the negative—Ayes 55, noes 107.

Mr. WISE now offered his amendment, viz:

Provided, That in case the Treasury notes outstanding and unredeemed, issued under former laws of Congress, added to the amount of such notes issued under the act and actually expended, or issued to meet payments due and payable before the 4th day of March next, shall, on the 4th day of March next, exceed the sum of five millions of dollars, then the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby authorized to issue, by virtue of the provisions of this act, such further amount of the said notes as will make the whole amount issued under this act and applicable to payments falling due after the 4th day of March next, the full sum of five millions of dollars.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative; ayes 90, noes 57.

The amendment submitted by Mr. JENIFER on Saturday last, and which he gave notice he would offer at the proper time, at his request was then read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States is authorized to raise by loan such sum or sums as the exigencies of the Government may require, but not to exceed ten millions of dollars, at an interest not more than six per centum per annum, to be reimbursed at any time after twelve months, whenever the condition of the Treasury will permit.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment was not now in order, as the gentleman on Saturday had merely signified his intention to offer it.

The amendment of Mr. CURTIS was next read as follows:

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever proof shall be exhibited, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the loss or destruction of any Treasury note issued under the authority of any act of Congress, it shall be lawful for the said Secretary, upon receiving bond, with sufficient security to indemnify the United States against any other claim on account of the Treasury note alleged to be so lost or destroyed, to pay the amount due on such note, to the person who had lost, or in whose possession it had been destroyed.

On the question being taken, the amendment was negatived—yeas 78, nays 82.

Mr. GREEN (as Mr. STANLY was absent) moved that the amendment of that gentleman be now taken up, which motion prevailed. It was then read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the day of on the importation of articles hereafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties, that is to say:

On all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

On all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, ten per cent. ad valorem.

On all wines, except the wines of France, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

On all wines of France, as soon as the treaty with France will allow, a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem.

On all bleached and unbleached linens, table linen, linen napkins, and linen cambrics, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

The foregoing duties being in accordance with the terms and the spirit of the act of March 21, 1833.

And be it further enacted, That all laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. WISE submitted whether the amendment was in order.

The CHAIR decided that it was.

Mr. BEATTY appealed from the decision of the Chair; but before the question was taken, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. GREEN withdrew the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia offered the following as an amendment, which was rejected without a count:

Provided, That it shall not be lawful for any officer of the Government to tender or propose to pay any Treasury note or notes thus authorized to be issued, to any person having demands against the Government, or to pay the same, unless asked for or desired by the creditor.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the committee now rise, and report the bill as amended to the House; which motion prevailed, and

The committee rose, and reported to the House the bill as amended; which, on motion of Mr. CRABB, was read as follows:

A BILL to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the Government may require; but not exceeding the sum of five millions of dollars of this emission, outstanding at any one time, to be reimbursed in the last quarters of the year, if the condition of the Treasury will permit it, and to be issued under the limitations and other provisions contained in the act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, and as modified by an act entitled "An act additional to the act on the subject of Treasury notes," approved the thirty-first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty, except that this law shall expire in one year from and after its passage.

Provided, That in case the Treasury notes outstanding and undecreed, issued under former laws of Congress, added to the amount of such notes issued under this act and actually expended, or issued to meet payments due and payable before the 4th day of March next, shall, on the 4th day of March next, exceed the sum of five millions of dollars, then the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby authorized to issue, by virtue of the provisions of this act, such further amount of the said notes as will make the whole amount issued under this act and applicable to payments falling due after the 4th day of March next, the full sum of five millions of dollars.

Mr. JAMESON moved the previous question; which was seconded.

And the question being on agreeing to the amendment,

Mr. PROFFIT called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—Yeas 111, nays 79.

On motion of Mr. LEET, at 8 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, February 6, 1841.

Mr. RAYNER, on leave, presented the resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, on the subject of the public domain and the reopening of Roanoke Inlet; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUSSELL asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON offered the following as a modification; but it was not accepted:

Resolved, That next Thursday, after the hour of three, and until Friday until three o'clock, be set apart for the bills and business of the District of Columbia.

Objection being made to the reception of the resolution,

Mr. RUSSELL moved a suspension of the rules.

And on that question the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 110, nays 54, as follows:

So the rules were suspended.

The previous question was then moved and seconded; and

On the main question being ordered,

Mr. SMITH of Maine called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 122, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Black, Boardman, Bond, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Aaron V. Brown, William O. Butler, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ANDREWS, from the Committee on Accounts, offered a resolution authorizing that committee to allow the pay of all such members of the House as were unavoidably detained by the late storm, on their way to the seat of Government; and who, in consequence, were prevented from taking their seats at the commencement of the session.

Objection being made to its reception,

Mr. ANDREWS moved to suspend the rules; but the motion was not sustained by the House.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL, on leave, presented the report of the Committee on Federal Relations of the House of Representatives of South Carolina, on so much of the Governor's message as relates to the election of President of the United States, the construction of the Constitution, and the future arrangements as to the tariff of duties on imports; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, also on leave, presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, in relation to the United States Bank and the public domain; which were laid upon the table.

Mr. HAND submitted a resolution, that all petitions and papers, the presentation of which were not objected to by the rules of the House, be referred to the appropriate committees, by the members presenting them endorsing their names thereon.

Mr. H. moved to suspend the rules, but the motion did not prevail.

PUBLIC LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

The SPEAKER then stated the first business in order to be the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands on the 16th of January, to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect bills to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same, passed the 18th day of April, 1806." The question was on the motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and pending the same, the morning hour had expired.

Mr. CROCKETT said he would not make the speech which he intended to have made, as he was sure every member understood the subject, and time was precious. Mr. C. then moved the previous question; which was ordered and put, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?" and passed in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER then decided that the main question was, shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. MONTGOMERY appealed from the decision, on the ground that the main question was that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS asked to be excused from voting on the question, and was proceeding to state his reasons why he ought to be excused.

When several gentlemen called him to order, on the ground that the previous question cut off debate.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS said he would then make a motion that would not be out of order; and that was, that the bill be laid upon the table; and thereupon called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—Yeas 39, nays 137, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Brockway, Bynum, John Campbell, Carroll, Chittenden, Connor, Deberry, Dromgoole, Evans, Fillmore, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Griffin, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hopkins, Jackson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Lane, Leadbetter, McCarty, Meredith Mallory, Montgomery, Morgan, Palen, Peck, Simonton, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, Tillinghast, Underwood, Lewis Williams, and Winthrop—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Barnard, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boardman, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Clifford, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Garrett Davis, Dickerson, Doe, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Fine, Fisher, Farnance, Galbraith, Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Goode, Habersham, Hall, Hand, John Hastings, Henry, Holt, Hubbard, Hunt, James, Jameson, Jennifer, Cave Johnson, Kempshall, Kille, King, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, Marchand, Marvin, Mason, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Monroe, Montanya, Moore, Morrow, Newhard, Nisbet, Parmenter, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Proffitt, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Sergeant, Shaw, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Stuart, Sweney, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, John B. Thompson, Toland, Triplett, Turney, Vroom, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—137.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question then recurred on the engrossment of the bill; and being put, passed in the affirmative.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS then moved that the bill be read a third time on Monday; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. LINCOLN then spoke at length on the merits of the bill; but, before he had concluded, the morning hour had expired, and the House then took up the following

SENATE BILLS:

The bill for the relief of Thomas Hutchinson was also read a third time; but being objected to, was similarly disposed of.

The bill for the relief of Esther Parrott was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill for the relief of Don Carlos de Villemont, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 16th of January, with the enacting words stricken out, coming up for consideration, the House concurred therein; and so the bill was rejected.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON asked leave to refer a memorial to the Committee on Military Affairs; but

Mr. CARR objected, on the ground that the same privilege was not given to others.

PRIVATE BILLS.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. Barges in the chair) on private bills.

The bills for the relief of Job Halsey and David W. Sleeth were then read; but being objected to,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved that the Committee rise, so as to put it in the power of the House to pass bills, and not leave the business at the mercy of any member who might choose to object, as was the case under the resolution adopted this morning.

The question was then taken—ayes 16—noes 87; no quorum.

Mr. ANDREWS said that, as there was no quorum, he would move that that fact be reported to the House.

The question was again taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 24, noes 111.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. STEENROD said it was evident no business could be done under the resolution which had been adopted this morning. He would, therefore, move that the committee rise, to enable the House so to amend the rules as to transact the business of the country.

The question was then taken—ayes 62, noes 55, no quorum.

The question was again taken by tellers, who reported—ayes 63, noes 54, no quorum voting.

On motion of Mr. STEENROD,

The committee then rose, and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. RUSSELL moved a call of the House.

Tellers were called for and appointed, who reported—ayes 52, noes 80.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved that the House adjourn, but withdrew the motion.

The House then again went into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWSON then moved that the committee rise, in order that the House might repeal the resolution adopted this morning.

The question was then taken and resulted—ayes 106, noes 35.

The committee then rose, and reported that they had made no progress.

Mr. WISE then moved to rescind the resolution.

Mr. EVERETT moved an adjournment.

The question was then and negatived—ayes 42, noes 107.

Mr. RARIDEN then moved to suspend the rules, so as to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill to confirm certain lands to the State of Indiana, for the continuation of the Wabash and Erie Canal.

The motion to suspend was negatived.

The motion of Mr. WISE to rescind the order of this morning recurred.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to adjourn; but subsequently withdrew his motion.

Mr. CURTIS then moved to adjourn; and the question was taken by yeas and nays, and negatived—Yaes 56, nays 86.

The question again recurred on the motion of Mr. WISE to rescind the order adopted this morning, which puts it into the power of a single member so to object to a bill, as to prevent all action upon it for the day; and passed in the affirmative. So the order was rescinded.

The question that the engrossed bill for the relief of Sarah B. Stith and her children do pass, again came up.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved the previous question; but withdrew to enable

Mr. PROFFIT to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER said that the bill was not open to amendment on its passage.

The previous question was then moved and ordered, and the main question taken on the passage of the bill by yeas and nays—Yaes 33, nays 86; no quorum voted.

The House then adjourned.

Mr. CRITTENDEN submitted an amendment, proposing to attach Arkansas to the eighth circuit, and Kentucky to the ninth district; which, after a discussion, in which Messrs. Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of procuring a sufficient number of the most approved repeating fire-arms to supply the troops operating against the Indians in Florida.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MERRICK moved that the Senate postpone the orders of the day, for the purpose of taking up the bill to revive and continue in force the act to incorporate the banks of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TAPPAN said there was but a few minutes of the morning hour unexpired, when the special order would be taken up as a matter of course. He would therefore leave it to the Senator whether it was worth while to take up the bill for the few minutes that was left for its consideration.

Mr. MERRICK persisting in his motion,

Mr. TAPPAN said there was another reason why the bill should not be taken up at this time. A resolution had been adopted some time since by the Senate, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information in relation to the losses sustained by the Government by the failure of banks and the depreciation of their notes; and he thought that information was necessary to enable them to act understandingly on a bill to charter these institutions.

Mr. ALLEN also opposed taking up the bill until the information called for by a resolution of the Senate was before them.

Mr. BENTON said that in a few minutes the hour would arrive when the bankrupt bill would come up for discussion, and he apprehended gentlemen did not ask that this bill should be taken up to the exclusion of the bankrupt bill. On Thursday last the Senate determined to take up the bankrupt bill and to go on with it; it was so taken up, and some progress was made in it. Some action was had upon it, and the Senate arrived at the question whether banking institutions should be included within its provisions. Now, did gentlemen wish to get rid of that by a side blow? Shall the banking institutions obey the law of the land, and pay their debts? was the simple question that was to come up before them. And what had taken place within the last few days, since the last adjournment of the Senate? He supposed they had all heard the news; and he supposed all who did him the honor to listen to what he said on Thursday, recollected that he had anticipated this event, but he had not anticipated that it would take place quite so soon. He had expected that it would take place in the course of the summer if a "called session" did not keep a certain thing alive; but the third suspension is here, and in time to have the case laid before the General Assembly, now in session, and in time, too, to furnish an excuse for a called session, for all the ordinary excuses had well nigh disappeared. It may now be said that a called session is necessary, to take into consideration the condition of the banks and the currency—to devise means to create a new Bank, the dead corpse of the old one lying before them, though he (Mr. BENTON) should think the fact would produce a different result. He should have supposed it would the rather have led to the conclusion that it was necessary to apply a bankrupt law to them, and not that a bankrupt law should be enacted to extend to trading incorporations, and not to banks. They ought to go on, and show to the people of the United States who was in favor of having the laws obeyed—who was in favor of having banking incorporations made subordinate to law and government. They should go on, too, and show the people, by their action, that there was no occasion for despair, but that there was still power in the law to regulate the banks, yea, even a fifty million monster. He wished this debate to go on; and therefore he was against taking up another subject; he was for going on from the point at which they stopped, and he hoped the Senators who should go into the debate, would present it in this point of view, that whenever the country got tired of the existing state of things—when they wanted law to govern—they had their remedy in a bankrupt law—in a bankrupt law which had the support of a Dallas twenty-five years ago, of a Crawford and a Macon, and even of our President. They would see that there was no reason to despair if they made these banking incorporations submit to law and government, by the exercise of their constitutional authority. With these views he objected to the taking up of the bill to re-charter the District Banks.

Mr. CRITTENDEN hoped the bill would not be taken up.

The question was then taken, when the motion was negatived—ayes 18, noes 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Graham, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Webster, and White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then moved that the special order be taken up, being the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. HUBBARD believed, in offering his resolution at the last discussion of this bill, that he was misunderstood, and he now explained that all he wished by asking for a division of the question on his resolution, was that he, and others also, might have the opportunity to vote on each separate proposition. This, he apprehended, would expedite instead of delaying the action of the Senate, as anticipated by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CRITTENDEN hoped no objection would be offered to that course, for he thought they could be more rapidly disposed of separately than collectively.

Mr. HUBBARD asked for the ayes and noes on the resolution; and as he did not wish to embarrass Senators with the 6 h resolution, he would withdraw it.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped the question would first be taken on the recommitment, as the disposal of that question might also dispose of the instructions. He then intimated that he should vote against the recommitment, but he was ready, in the mean time, to bear any proposition that gentlemen might have to make.

Mr. WRIGHT begged it might be understood, that if the Senate refused to recommit, all the instructions, as instructions, would fall with it, and no vote could be taken upon them. He wished the Senate to bear this in mind.

The question was then taken, and the motion to recommit was negatived—ayes 16, noes 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, Williams and Young—30.

Mr. HUBBARD then moved an amendment to the first section of the bill, the purport of which was to include banking and trading incorporations within its provisions, and he called for the ayes and noes thereon.

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired whether the Senator from New Hampshire did not intend to fix some particular time for the commencement of the operation of that provision.

Mr. HUBBARD had intended to fix a time when the bill should take effect, if his amendment were adopted, otherwise such a motion would be unnecessary.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama had given an intimation a few days ago that he should vote against including banking incorporations in the bill; he had made a motion to strike out a clause to that effect, at the last session, and on referring to the Constitutions of the old States, he was confirmed in the determination to which he had come. He then read extracts from the Constitution of Alabama to show that banks were established by the sovereign authority of the State—in some of which, in fact, the State held capital—and therefore he contended that he, as a Senator from Alabama, could not consent to vote to extend such a provision of this bill to such State incorporations, as the State would necessarily be affected by such an enactment. He was opposed in every point of view to the intermeddling in State institutions in the manner proposed, or to their assuming powers which did not belong to them.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had given them, the other day, as part of his argument, a long extract from a letter written by the present Chief Magistrate of this Union, to some committee, during the last summer. In return, he (Mr. CLAY) proposed to read, as rather more orthodox, the remarks of Senator Van Buren, which he thought would be found to contain the better argument. The extract to which he referred was as follows:

"Mr. Van Buren did not think that any great difficulty existed in this question. To him the matter was clear; but his impressions had been opposed by several Senators, and he would protract the debate but a moment, to give, very briefly, his views of the matter. It certainly appeared to him, that one moment's reflection would decide gentlemen against the amendment proposed by his friend from South Carolina. It had been said formerly, and on various occasions, that the States had no right to grant bank charters, and that the banking privilege belonged exclusively to the Federal Government. No direct attempt, however, had hitherto been made to deprive the States of that power which they had long exercised unmolested. But now the attempt was to be made (if not in an open and unequivocal manner, at least in an indirect way,) to strip the States of the power of chartering banks. At any rate, if it were contended that this provision did not go so far, it could not be denied that it interfered in the regulation which State Governments might have adopted for the government of those institutions, which was an odious exercise of power not granted by the Constitution. This amendment has this extent: It directs the States as to the manner in which they shall exercise their sovereignty in this particular, and points out what penalty shall be inflicted in case the charters granted by the States are violated. In fact, it points out what the privileges granted to the incorporations shall be, by dictating the forfeiture, and directing what the companies may, and what they may not do. All this has hitherto been done by the States. They have assumed the direction of these matters as a right, which they doubtless have. And, in including this subject of corporations in the bill now before the Senate, it will be taken entirely from the States, and subjected to the power of the bankrupt system. This was never done, and never attempted in any country on the face of the globe. In England, such a provision was never dreamed of—nor did he believe that, when the Constitution was framed, such an attribute was imagined by those who authorized the establishment of a bankrupt system. He did not accede to the opinion, that the system had power over all chartered institutions. By the very nature of their association, they were, in some respects, exempted from its operation, and no such power was ever contemplated, or was, at this moment, under the most extended construction, enjoyed by the General Government."

Thus it would be seen Senator Van Buren took views which were now entertained by some Senators then on that floor on the same subject, against the proposition, on constitutional grounds. It was clear to him (Mr. CLAY) that if Congress could assume such power over the banking institutions of the States, it could do that which would amount to a forfeiture of their rights; if it could do that, it could tax their emissions, and thereby assume a power which the party with which he acted had ever disclaimed. In Alabama there was a compact between these institutions and the State, and Alabama had particularly reserved to herself all power to control this matter. A suspension of specie payments, by such a clause, would subject the banks to the operation of the bankrupt law, and this was a matter which the States alone should control, and for which the State Legislatures should inflict the penalty which, under the circumstances of the case, might be just and equitable. The State banks had been sanctioned by the Executive of this Government, where they were made the depositories of its treasures, and Congress could, on no principle, say they should be put down, without the delegation of express power. For such a proposition as that now made, he was not prepared, nor did he believe the people, whom he in part represented, were prepared for it, and therefore he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD agreed so to modify his amendment, as to make it take effect on the 1st of January, 1842. He then said it had been contended, and properly contended, that Congress possessed the power to pass a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, and that it might be passed for the relief of the debtor, as well as for the benefit of the creditor; now it struck him that no natural persons should be included, more than the artificial. It was not every State that became stockholders in the banks, but did it make any difference whether it was the State or a member of the State that held the stock? So far as his knowledge extended, where the State was the stockholder, things were managed as bad as they could be, and with less care and security to the public than where the institutions were composed of individuals exclusively. But where was the difference? Take Alabama; her Constitution gave her the power to establish banks; but did it say that she should hold the stock in all future time? Did it provide that it should never be surrendered and become the property of individuals in any future time?

Mr. BENTON. If any body will buy it.

Mr. HUBBARD. Yes, if any body would buy it. He took it that it should be handed over at the pleasure of the State, and when so transferred that it should become the property of individuals. He asked whether the events of the last few years had not shown it to be high time that the banks should be brought within some such provision? There was not a solvent and sound institution in the State in which he lived but would desire such a provision, for it would go effectually to secure the credit and to give efficiency and value to institutions of this kind. These incorporations had peculiar privileges conferred upon them—they could make their bills current as money, and then they could suspend when they pleased; and it struck him that the holders of their notes should have a remedy, by making these incorporations subject to the operation of a bill of this sort. Now what security had the holders of their notes? If such a provision as this had been heretofore in operation, would the bill holders have sustained the losses to which they had been compelled to submit by the failure of the banks to redeem their paper? He was willing and desirous that this bill should be made as comprehensive as possible; he wished to relieve the unfortunate debtor, and also to secure the rights of the honest creditor, and there were no more unfortunate debtors in the land than those who were obliged to take the paper of the banks; and with these views, he had made his proposition.

Mr. SEVIER was astonished that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] was not broader than it was, and that it was not thereby provided that the indebted States should be put up at auction. Why did not the Senator carry out his principle, and sell the States when they failed to pay their dividends? He (Mr.

SEVIER) was opposed to all such projects; and as long as he was there, offend whosoever it may—Mr. Van Buren or any one else—he would vote against them. His friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] had read a provision of the Constitution of that State in justification of his vote; the Constitution of the State of Arkansas contained a similar provision; and if the banks suspended, it was for the State to interfere with the agents acting under her authority. What right had they, sitting in that Senate chamber, as the servants of the States, to criticise the household of their masters at home? He was opposed to all such projects, and so long as he remained there uninstruced, he should continue to vote against them. Besides, the country was now somewhat embarrassed, and if ever there was a time for the exercise of forbearance and charity, this was the time for the exercise of those virtues.

Mr. HENDERSON was glad to hear the language which had just fallen from the Senator from Arkansas. This was a question of power and of constitutional right; if it were a question of expediency, he might vote for including banks within the provision of the Senator from New Hampshire; but he could see, no more than could the Senator from Arkansas, the authority they possessed to include the banks, which were but an emanation from or a scintillation of the States, sent forth to be recalled at pleasure. If they could interfere with any portion of the sovereignty of the States, they could interfere with all their sovereignty. Why, he might ask, with the Senator from Arkansas, were not the States themselves included in this bill? for they got into debt. If they could include the incorporations of the States, why could they not include the States themselves? Why, in his opinion, there could not be a greater arrogation of power than would be assumed by the Congress of the United States, if this amendment should be adopted. It would be to give this Government supreme dominion over the States, and to take it from the people in their sovereign capacity. He objected, then, to this proposition, as a simple question of power.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke at some length, a report of which will be given hereafter.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut followed, and contended for the right of Congress to extend a bankrupt law to banking institutions. He argued that, if the exercise of the sovereign power of a State in the incorporation of these institutions excluded them from the operations of this law, the exercise of similar sovereign power would exclude trading corporations also. The whole beneficial operation of the law on trade and commerce will be thwarted by the action of the State Legislatures. So far as the States may choose to give charters of incorporation to their citizens, they are entirely exempt from its operation. A state, if it thinks proper, may incorporate all its citizens. There is a general law of incorporation in the State of Connecticut, by which every citizen of the State may be incorporated, and of course, if the doctrine contended for by some gentlemen be correct, will be exempt from the operations of this law. He held that a State had no right to divest itself of its sovereignty in this manner, if the effect of doing so would be to create privileged classes in the community.

Mr. CALHOUN rose not to protract the debate, nor to enter at large into the argument upon the point immediately in discussion, but to reply to a remark of the Senator from New York, who had adduced the only argument in favor of including incorporations which had the semblance of plausibility. The Senator says that if we have the power to pass a law, operative upon natural persons, in their individual capacity as citizens of a State, he can see no reason to prevent our including those persons associated in companies with corporate powers granted by State Legislatures. He can see no reason to exempt an artificial body from the operation of a law to which the natural body is subject. Now the very fact of this body being of State creation, is the reason why it should be exempt from the operation of our laws. This Government cannot control or interfere with the States in their appropriate spheres of action; nor can the States interrupt or interfere with the operations of the Federal Government in its legitimate sphere. If a State Legislature incorporates banks, we cannot touch them. And in relation to the United States Bank, the court below has decided that it could not be interfered with by State authority. He would not go into this argument, but under every view in which he had contemplated it, he considered it the boldest assumption of power ever proposed to be conferred upon the Federal Government. If we can overrule State legislation in regard to incorporations, what act of a State can be considered sacred from our interference? The very basis of the argument is that the States are not capable of doing their duty, and we, patriotic we, step in and do it for them. The Senator from Arkansas had not, in his opinion, pushed the argument far, when he said if you placed the incorporated companies of a State under a commission of bankruptcy, you might next attempt to place the State herself in the same position. This whole argument was in face of the fact that England had never attempted to extend her bankrupt laws over incorporations.

He then entered into the question of the expediency of this measure. To include these incorporations in a bankrupt bill, would be to place four-fifths of the business men of the country in a commission of bankruptcy. The banks have now owing to them from the community, at least five hundred millions of dollars; and to subject them to a bankrupt law would subject every man who owed them to the same process, and your commissioners of insolvency would have half the property of the Union in their hands. Public feeling would rebel against this state of things, and your law would be impotent.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama submitted a few remarks in reply to the Senator from New York. Every State had a right to deal with her institutions as she thought proper. The Senator said that New York had placed her banks under the operation of a bankrupt law. This she had a perfect right to do; but did not every Senator perceive the difference between the State doing this herself and the Federal Government assuming the power to do it? But suppose we incorporate this amendment into the bill, and it is attempted to be enforced upon the banks of New York, will there not be a conflict of jurisdiction between the State and United States Commissioners of Insolvency, and, if so, which will prevail? If the course pursued by New York in this matter be beneficial, let it be imitated by other States; but it is no argument for this Government to assume the power of placing the property of a State in the hands of a commissioner of the Federal Government. He then, at some length described the connection between the State and the banks of Alabama. He hoped gentlemen would look to the consequences of this doctrine; and if it was attempted to be carried out, he thought it very probable they would soon hear from the States who were interested.

Mr. WRIGHT had but a few remarks to make in reply. As to the connection of the State of Alabama with her banks, he would ask if the State acknowledged herself bound to pay the notes, and other liabilities of the banks? If she did not, he could not see the force of the Senator's argument. Then, as to the argument of the Senator from South Carolina. He says that within their respective spheres the jurisdiction of the Federal and State Governments must not conflict with each other, and instances the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of McCulloch, to show that the States have no power over a company chartered by the Federal Government. Now this decision of the Supreme Court was no law to him. It presupposed the Federal Government had power to charter a banking incorporation, which he denied. But suppose the decision correct, what did it amount to. Only that a law of Congress, constitutionally passed, is superior to the law of a State; and the Senator says, ergo, this Government cannot tax corporate property created by the State. Is the Senator willing to say that all property which might be covered by acts of incorporation shall be exempt from taxation? New York has passed a law by which all religious societies may incorporate themselves, without further appeal to State legislation. She has power to pass, giving to mechanics, to farmers, and to every class who may apply for it, the same privileges, and thus to cover all the property of the State by acts of incorporation, and thus take it out of the reach of the taxing power of this Government.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had not advanced an argument, but merely laid down a principle, that each Government was supreme in its proper sphere. As to the right of this Government to charter a National Bank, the Senator knew his opinions; they were the same as his own. The real question in this case, was, when the two parties have rights, and their exercise becomes incompatible, which must give way; and he had no hesitation in saying, in the case supposed by the Senator from New York, the taxing power of the General Government would be paramount. The mere fact that in England, whence we have derived this law, its form and its language, it is never applied to incorporations, should be conclusive with us. He repeated, what he had before said, that he considered it the boldest assumption upon the rights of the States ever attempted by the Federal Government.

Mr. HENDERSON rose, but yielded to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MONDAY, February 8, 1841.

Mr. JONES said, as there was but a short time of the session now remaining, he was induced to submit a motion that the House go into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the

PENSION BILL.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON remarked that he had received a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to a pacification about being made, or already made, with the Seminole Indians. The communication was such as, in his opinion, required the immediate action of the House; and he would ask that it be read.

Mr. ADAMS said, that this was the day set apart for the presentation of petitions. As three or four weeks had elapsed since gentlemen had an opportunity of presenting petitions to the House, and as this would be the last day on which they would have an opportunity of doing so, he hoped that at least one day would be devoted to the petitions of the people of the United States. Mr. A. said that he had, in his drawer, a hundred petitions, and that nine-tenths of those that came north of Mason and Dixon's line, would be excluded under the 21st rule of the House.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. JONES to go into Committee of the Whole; but before any action was taken thereon,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS called for the reading of the communication from the Secretary of War; which was read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 6, 1841.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs, a copy of a communication to the Adjutant General from Gen. Armistead, commanding the army in Florida, asking a remittance of $100,000 to enable him to comply with his promises to the hostile Indians in Florida, in the event of their surrendering themselves for emigration. In the present temper of the Indians, and from the fact that a number have already come in at the various posts and surrendered their arms, there is reason to hope that Gen. Armistead's promises will induce them to come in and give themselves up for removal to the West. The course adopted by the General has, therefore, met the approbation of the Department, both as a measure of economy and humanity, as the inducement held out by him is calculated to end this protracted contest at much less expense of blood and treasure than to continue the war another month.

The Department has, however, no money under its control, applicable to the object, and respectfully recommend that an appropriation of the amount named by Gen. Armistead ($100,000) be asked of Congress for that purpose.

Very respectfully,

J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. WADDY THOMPSON,
Chairman of Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

HEADQUARTERS, Army of Florida,
Tampa, January 16, 1841.

SIR: I have the honor to report that I have just arrived from Pease Creek and Punta Russa. I visited those places for the purpose of meeting a party of the Seminoles and inducing them to come in.

I did not succeed in obtaining an interview with those chiefs; but several of their people came to see me, accompanied by two of the delegation from Arkansas. They united in saying that they would return in eight days with a party, if not the whole, of their people, and embark on board the steamboat which I shall dispatch to meet them.

I have promised the two chiefs each five thousand dollars, and agreed to pay every warrior who comes in thirty dollars, and give him a rifle, blanket and clothing. To fulfil this and other promises which I have made to the Indians, I trust there will be no delay in forwarding to me or Captain Page the necessary sum of money; or in ordering Captain Armstrong to report to me, with the funds committed to him, for the purpose of facilitating the emigration.

Thirty or forty Indians are expected here in a few days from the head of the Withlacoochie. They desired an escort to protect them from the Mickasukies, which was accordingly furnished.

A considerable number of the Tallahasseees are now in at various points. I shall concentrate them here as soon as practicable. I respectfully enclose herewith a report from Lieut. Col. Leomis, commanding at Fort Clinch, where Echoemathla, chief of the Tallahasseees, has doubtless arrived ere this.

I am, sir, &c.

W. K. ARMISTEAD,
Brig. Gen. Commanding in Florida.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War.

P. S. $100,000 will probably be required for the objects mentioned in this letter.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said he would now ask, with the general consent of the House, that he might be allowed to present a bill relating to that object, and move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering it.

Mr. JONES of Virginia suggested that when the House should go into Committee of the Whole, and take up the pension bill, the proposition of Mr. Thompson could be offered as an amendment to it.

Mr. PROFFIT was about making an appeal to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and to the House, as this was the last day on which any thing could be done on "the bill to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected for that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal, which lies between the mouth of Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes; when

The question on going into a committee of the Whole was again stated; and thereupon

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. W. THOMPSON inquired whether the question was on his motion or on that of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JONES]

The SPEAKER replied, on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PICKENS asked whether the House, after going into a Committee of the Whole, could not take up any subject they chose.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

The question was then taken, and resulted—yeas 92, nays 92.

There being a tie, the SPEAKER voted in the affirmative.

So the rules were suspended.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CLIFORD in the chair,) and took up the following bill, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means on the 18th of December last, viz:

A BILL making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensions of the United States, for the year eighteen hundred and forty-one.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby appropriated, in addition to former appropriations, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury nor otherwise appropriated, for the pensioners of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-one:

For the revolutionary pensioners under the act of the eighteenth of March, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, three hundred and fourteen thousand dollars;

For the payment of invalid pensions, one hundred and seventy thousand dollars;

For pensions to widows and orphans under the act of the fourth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, four hundred and eighty-eight thousand two hundred and forty-one dollars;

For five years' pensions to widows under the act of the seventh of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, one hundred and sixty-eight thousand three hundred and fourteen dollars;

For half pay pensions, payable through the offices of the Second and Third Auditors, five thousand dollars;

For arrearages, payable through the Second Auditor's office six hundred dollars;

For arrearages, payable through the Third Auditor's office one thousand dollars.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON then offered to amend the bill, by adding the following:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the benefit of such of the Seminole chiefs and warriors as may surrender for emigration.

Mr. PETRIKIN desired to know whether that amendment was in order.

After some discussion of a conversational character, the CHAIR decided that the amendment was in order.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON observed that it would be unnecessary for him to say any thing in relation to the expediency of adopting the amendment, inasmuch as the facts furnished by the Secretary would make that apparent to all. He then proceeded to say that he had said long ago that we would never be able to end that disastrous war in any way but by negotiation. It was foolish to attempt to fight or to drive off the Indians, under such circumstances, when we could buy them off at a much less expense.

After some further remarks, Mr. T. alluded to the growing power and ambition of Great Britain, and the extremely delicate position in which we were placed in relation to that power. Looking at all this, he observed the man must be silly to suppose that she would suffer McLeod, one of her citizens, to be executed by us for obeying the avowed order of his Government. Mr. T. then alluded to the facilities of Great Britain in the West Indies, etc. for annoying us in case of a war, and wondered at the supineness of Southern gentlemen on the subject.

It might be said, however, that we should lose our dignity by thus ending the war by negotiation. That was out of the question, for our dignity was gone already. But it would be recollected that we had not been conflicting with Indians only, but with nature. We had been struggling against the climate, swamps, marshes, and other inaccessible places. He then referred to the unsuccessful struggle of England in the Maroon war for eighty years, under similar circumstances, and which was at last ended by negotiation. Mr. T. concluded by expressing his belief that this was the important crisis for an advantageous termination of the war in Florida.

Mr. PROFFIT understood that the sum required by the amendment was to perfect an agreement that had been made for terminating that war. If so, he would vote for it, as it was enough for him to know that it was recommended by the party now in power. Under these circumstances, he would vote for it, although it had been a million.

Mr. P. then complained of the peculiar tone recently assumed in the debates, on all appropriations, with relation to the growing powers of Great Britain. But why was Great Britain selected in preference to other countries? Why was nothing said about France? The latter country might send her seventy-four gun ships to batter down forts in South America—she might extend her power in Africa, and do other things, without a word being said. But it appeared that Great Britain alone had been selected as the theme for declamation. Now if gentlemen were for war, why did they not propose it, and not talk about it. All the difference between them and Great Britain was, that while they talked, Great Britain acted. That was all the difference.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said if the gentlemen alluded to him, he was the last man on that floor to go to war; nor would he do it unless forced into it.

Mr. PROFFIT said he believed it. But at this time, when there was not a speck of war, what use was there for gentlemen to make such speeches about Great Britain and her growing power? Great Britain was not arming? She was merely maintaining her position as a great nation, and why did not we follow her example? He also objected to our anticipating the action of the courts in New York in relation to the case of McLeod.

Mr. P. hoped this question of war would not be canvassed in this way, for if suffered it would lead to inextricable debate. Let us, said Mr. P., confine the debate to the subject of the Florida war, and not by these war speeches sanction the idea that the American Congress is secretly harboring the spirit of war, when it has not the courage to declare it.

Mr. PETRIKIN could not go for the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina. He, Mr. P. wished to act with proper caution in these matters. He did not wish those scenes to be enacted over again, when the Indians had been furnished with blankets, powder, ball, and other things, and had then turned round and massacred men, women and children.

Mr. P. was not in favor of countenancing the usurpation of power by any general officer. Where had General Armistead the power to give his pledge to the Indians, on the part of this Government? Were we, by the adoption of this amendment, to sanction this usurpation of power? Mr. P. proceeded to say that, although he was a party man, his party did not teach him to act contrary to the principles of right. His party did not teach him subordination of perjury. Besides, he had another objection. Proper time ought to be allowed for an inquiry into this matter. He, for one, was not in favor of voting away a hundred thousand dollars, without a report from a committee to show the why and wherefore.

Mr. GIDDINGS then took the floor, and, at great length, went into an investigation of the causes, history, etc. of the Florida war.

Mr. G. in the course of his remarks, which he said were already written out, commented largely on the Abolition question, the kidnapping of negroes, etc. as having a powerful agency in the cause of the hostilities in Florida.

Mr. MARK A. COOPER followed; and was making some very keen remarks on the subject of kidnapping, and how the sympathies of Abolition gentlemen were affected by circumstances, when, at the request of several members, he gave way to a motion that the committee rise. That motion prevailing, the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. ALBERT SMITH moved the House do adjourn.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The motion to adjourn was then withdrawn.

Mr. JONES of Virginia, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the present year; which was read twice, referred to a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EASTMAN of New Hampshire, after some difficulty in obtaining the floor, on leave introduced a bill to extend for five years the act, approved July 7, 1838, granting half pay and pensions to certain widows.

After some appropriate remarks from Mr. E. the bill was read twice, committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS of Tennessee, it was Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of so changing and adjusting the circuits of the United States courts as to distribute and equalize, as far as practicable, the labor of the judges.

The House then adjourned.

NOTE.—The Senate bill providing for a settlement of the claims of New Hampshire, was, some time ago, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 9, 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Commissioners for the exploration and survey of the Northeastern boundary, with reference to a further appropriation for the completion of the duty assigned to them. The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, showing the quantity of public land ceded to each of the respective States for certain specified purposes; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIERCE presented certified copies of papers in the Pension Office, in support of the claims of Margaret Miller and Elizabeth Whitman to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, the Committee on Pensions was instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Molly Luther, widow of a Revolutionary soldier.

Mr. YOUNG presented the joint memorial of the General Assembly of Illinois, praying the establishment of a Marine Hospital at the city of Cairo; which was referred to this Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a memorial of citizens of Warren county, Mississippi, in favor of the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. GRAHAM presented a memorial of Murray and Spencer; which referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Langtree and Jenkins, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which a resolution on the subject was yesterday referred, reported a bill to annex the Cherokee territory, in the State of Alabama, to the Coosa land district, and the removal of the land office of said district.

On motion of Mr. C. the bill was then reconsidered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the bill further supplementary to an act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed the 24th of September, 1789, was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. NORVELL, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill authorizing the States to tax any lands within their limits sold by the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PRESTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of De Peyster and Croger; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill to alter one of the terms of the circuit court of the District of Ohio, and for other purposes; and

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Daniel Petibone, deceased, were severally read a third time and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the relief of Jacob Pennell and others, owners of the Eliza of Brunswick;

The bill for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket;

The bill for the relief of Caspar W. Wever; and

The bill for the relief of certain companies of Missouri volunteers; were severally considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable the claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th of May, 1824, and an act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said acts to claimants to land within the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, was taken up on motion by Mr. LINN, who proposed several amendments thereto, which were agreed to; and the bill as amended was discussed by Messrs. KING, LINN, SEVIER, and BAYARD, and was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States was taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. HENDERSON resumed the debate, and reviewed the operation of the law as proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, if adopted, on banking and other incorporations, and the power of Congress so far to extend such a provision. If this bill could made to include one incorporation, he argued that it could be extended to all incorporations; and, consequently, a township, a city, a county, or a State, and, in short, any thing that had a corporate existence, could be embraced; but he denied that such power existed in that body.

Mr. WALKER did not intend to have taken part in this discussion; but after the course which this debate has taken, and after the doctrines had been expressed which he had heard promulgated during that debate, he could not abstain from some remark. The constitutional question which was here involved, was of the highest importance—it struck at the very existence of our institutions—and if the doctrine which had been there promulgated, could be sustained as the constitutional views of that body, it would be attended with calamitous consequences. What was it? It was that a State, by the grant of a charter to her citizens, can exempt them from the operation of the powers granted by the Constitution to the United States. That was the question, and it was one of solemn import; for if a State, by granting a charter to any number of her citizens, can exempt them from the operation of the powers granted to this Government, she can exempt all her citizens from the operation of that power. And if she can exempt her citizens from the operation of one power of this Government, she can exempt them from the operation of all its powers, and thereby nullify and overthrow the Government itself. That was the question. It was that a number of individuals of a State, by obtaining an act of incorporation as a bank, can override, by that legislative authority, all the granted powers of this Government. And this must be admitted to be a question of solemn import. Power was vested in Congress to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; and over whom was it to operate? The citizens of every State of the Union. And what was asked on the other side? Why, that a certain number of citizens, by obtaining a charter of incorporation from the State Legislature, may rise up and exempt themselves from the operation of the granted powers of this Government. He (Mr. WALKER) was ready to defend the just rights of the States on any occasion, but he should not assist them in their attempt to usurp the rights granted by the Constitution, and by every State of the Union, to this Government! This power, then, of the General Government, being undeniable, he would ask whether a State could exempt her citizens from the operation of this power in any mode; for if she could do it by the grant of charters of incorporation, she could do it in any other mode.

And again, bankers were individuals who were engaged in trade; there were banks that were incorporated and banks that were not incorporated; and a bankrupt law was to be passed to operate on all the people of the Union; the powers given to Congress were to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; but if the doctrine here proclaimed were to be admitted, the law would not operate with entire uniformity throughout the Union, as it would be stopped on the very threshold of those States that thus assumed the power to exempt their citizens from the operation of the law. Now he denied that the States possessed any such power to exempt their citizens from the operation of this or any other power vested in this Government. The powers so vested in this Government were supreme, any thing in any State laws to the contrary notwithstanding; and he called upon Senators to consider the importance of the question whether any and every State, by granting to all and any of her citizens—for if she could exempt one she could exempt all—charters of incorporation could thus override the powers of the General Government. Now he found there were many powers granted by the Constitution to this Government, and could the States at their pleasure exempt their citizens from the operation of all these powers? Take, for instance, the taxing power. Were corporations exempted from the operation of the taxing power of this Government? Were individuals exempted from it by receiving charters of incorporation? If so, this Government has no taxing power, or it is destroyed at the will and pleasure of the States, for they had only to cover their citizens by a State charter of incorporation. But who would venture to assert that the States had such power? And was not the bankrupt power as clearly delegated to Congress as this taxing power? or was one power granted to Congress a sovereign power, and the other a limited power. No; the bankrupt power was just as clearly delegated as any other. But again: this Government has the right to collect duties on imports; but may not the States grant charters of incorporation to wholesale importers; and will those charters exempt them from paying the duties on their importations within the limits of the State? If charters of incorporation could exempt bankrupts from the operation of the power of this Government, might not importing companies, by similar charters, be exempt from the operation of the law levying duties on imports. Take again the powers of the Government to levy war. Now they knew that, in many States, there were incorporated volunteer companies; and if this Government could not apply its powers to those corps, because they were incorporated, this Government has no power to make war, for these chartered companies were not subject to this Government. They might take up other cases in succession, and they might strike out all the powers vested in Congress; for the sections of the Constitution conferring such powers, were but so many dead letters if these charters were so many exemptions from the operation of the powers of this Government. He then proceeded to reply to the arguments of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] of the previous day, and he contended that the township commissioners, &c. to whom that honorable Senator had referred, were but quasi corporations for the transaction of public and not private business—that they were not beyond the control of the repealing power of the State, and were in fact, and in the language of the best American authorities, quasi officers, as much as a constable, a sheriff, or a county board of police, for the transaction for the State of its local business within its legitimate sphere. The distinction, then, was clear between corporations for public and corporations for private purposes, the one being for the transaction of the business of the States, and the other of individuals unconnected with the sovereignty of the States. But a plea was here set up that private incorporations for the transaction of private business under a contract with State Legislatures, should be exempt from the powers of this Government. Here then were exemptions claimed for incorporations that were not the agents of the States; that were not subject to the repealing power of the States, but were corporations of private individuals for the transaction of private business, without exercising any of the power of sovereign authority of the States. They were engaged in private pursuits, and now they came in and asked, on account of an engagement with the States for the transaction of their own private business, to be exempt from the powers of this Government. The gentleman from South Carolina, yesterday, had cited a case in which it was decided that they could not tax branches of the Bank of the Union; but if that honorable Senator would look again at that decision, he would find that it was decided on the ground that the bank was a public corporation—the fiscal agent of the Government—and that all its branches were equally the agents of the Government; and on that ground alone was the exemption pronounced. If it had been a private corporation, it would have been subject to the taxing power. The decision, then, went to show that they might tax banks, so long as they were private incorporated companies, chartered for private gain and emolument; and that a public corporation which was the fiscal agent of the Government was beyond the taxing power. But were these trading bank incorporations the fiscal agents of the Government of this Union? Were they the officers of the Government? Did they transact its fiscal business? If so, how dared they assert that their charters were beyond the repealing power and the control of the Government? What made them? What was the fiscal agent beyond the power that created it? There never was such an agency established on earth: the authority that made it could recall or change its powers at pleasure; and, as the banks were not the agents of the Government, they were not exempt from the taxing power of the State or of the General Government. A case had occurred in Rhode Island in which the Supreme Court had decided that the State did possess this taxing power, and if the State did, why did not the General Government? And if these private incorporations were subject to the taxing power, could any good reason be given why they were not subject to the bankrupt power? But they had been told they must not touch State banks, or banks of which the State was proprietor in whole or in part. Now, if gentlemen wished to exempt State banks from the operation of the section under discussion, let them move an amendment for that purpose; but he denied, so far as the question of power was concerned, that a bank was exempt because it had a State as a partner. Why had not the same tribunal to which the honorable Senator from South Carolina had referred—the Supreme Court of the Union—decided that when a State becomes a partner in a bank or other incorporation, it lays down its sovereignty and has no more power, as a member of that corporation, than the humblest individual? It was not then to be viewed as a State, but as a co-partner, nor otherwise than as an individual partner; and if a State becomes a banking company, it is clearly unconstitutional; for a State has not the authority to emit bills of credit. He pronounced, then, that the power claimed to exempt these chartered companies from the operation of the power of the General Government, was an unjustifiable assumption of power, which was not possessed by a potentate of France or Russia. Now, if there ever was a period when this bankrupt power ought to be applied to the banks, it was now, when the explosions around them were like the report of artillery on the battle-field, where scarcely had the sound of one ceased to reverberate on the ear before they had another and another in quick and quicker succession, and they were surrounded with the wrecks and fragments of banking institutions. When the banks ceased to answer the object for which they were created, they ought to be subject, like any other insolvent trading company, to the bankrupt power of the Union; or if an exemption should exist at all, it ought to be in favor of the unfortunate private trader, and not of the banking company which was invested with so many exclusive privileges. If there were any of these banking companies that were more mismanaged than others, it was those which were owned in whole or in part by the States—they were more corrupt and corrupting, for they both corrupted States and individuals; and had they not seen a report in regard to one of these banks which was owned by one of the States of the Union, by which loans to the amount of $700,000 had been made to the State Legislature to which it was responsible—yes, it had been found upon examination—upon an opening of “the secrets of the prison house,” that the members of the Legislature stood indebted to that bank to the amount of $700,000, and yet it was asked that the State Legislature should possess the power to apply to that bank the operation of a bankrupt law! Why, this was a reason why that Legislature was not the proper depository of such power. It would be, in fact, the debtors applying a bankrupt law to the creditors. And what had they seen in his native State (Pennsylvania) but a few days ago? Why, the State borrowing 400,000 dollars from a bank which in a few days afterwards exploded; and yet that Legislature was to possess the power to apply a bankrupt law to that incorporation. Now, he would say to the gentlemen that were friends of the banks, that if they wished to save the system from total annihilation, they must take a new latitude and change the point of their compass, for they could only be sustained by the public confidence. Now they could suspend at pleasure, and set the State Legislatures at defiance; and it became the people of the States to apply an appropriate remedy. They had recently been told that the Bank of England required twenty-six years to resume; and what was that but to inform the people of this Union that a certain bank must have the same period to resume as its great prototype? He was not aware that any other power could prevent suspension, except the powers to be possessed by a bankrupt law; and this would operate on the instincts of these incorporations whose sole object was money-making. With such a law in existence, they would not dare to flood the country with millions on millions of their paper money, for they would know that there existed a decree, which was fixed and irrevocable, which would follow and punish every abuse of power. After a few other observations, the honorable gentleman concluded with a brief recapitulation of the arguments he had adduced in the course of his address.

Mr. CALHOUN said the Senator from Mississippi had misapprehended his argument on a preceding day. The question was not whether a State can exempt individual citizens from the operation of the powers of this Government, but whether, when the State has exercised its acknowledged powers, this Government can exercise powers destructive of the acknowledged powers of the States, and consequently all the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, founded on that misapprehension, fell to the ground. He (Mr. CALHOUN) had no doubt the General Government might tax individuals composing incorporations, and the corporations themselves; for, according to his estimate of the taxing power, it was to get money and not to destroy, for destruction would defeat its own object. With respect to the decision of the Supreme Court, he had no hesitation to express the opinion that it was wrong. He believed the State had the right to levy the tax, and he believed the Senator from Mississippi was wrong in supposing the decision was founded on the assumption that the bank was a public and not a private corporation. Be that as it might, his (Mr. CALHOUN's) memory could not be mistaken on the point that the taxing power was treated as a power to destroy; but he thought it was the reverse of that. But to proceed to another point. The Senator from Mississippi had placed his argument, as he (Mr. CALHOUN) understood it, on the ground that the bankrupt power was an absolute power.

He (Mr. CALHOUN) understood it might extend to all cases of debtor and creditor, and that was what he understood by absolute power. Bankruptcy was a technical term, and he concurred with the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] who made a report on the subject last year, that it was limited to creditors and not to debtors, and that such had been the basis of all bankrupt laws heretofore considered or proposed for adoption, and consequently that it was destructive of voluntary bankruptcies, which were treated as mere insolvencies. Now what was the difference between public and private corporations? The one was said to be an incorporation for individual and special interest; but were not all created for a public purpose, or under the plea of a public purpose? It would be a gross abuse of power to confer such privileges, unless it were to promote some public object; and the people of the United States believed these private incorporations were useful in promoting trade, and navigation, and commerce, and so forth. If such, then, were the object, what possible difference could it make whether the interests were separate or otherwise?

After a few other observations he defended the right of the States to exercise authority over the banks of the States, and to insist upon forfeitures for suspension; and he inquired whether it had come to this, that Congress was to interfere because the State Legislatures were too indolent or too corrupt to do it. He was of opinion that it was not for Congress to undertake it. He then stated various grounds on which he opposed this proposition. He opposed it as leading to a breaking up of a system in which the debts and credit of the country were concentrated, because it would force on a universal settlement all over the land, and because they could not do it without a violation of the Constitution; and also because, if they adopted this proposition, they would get a principle which would include every township in New England. For these and other reasons, he opposed this proposition.

Mr. WALKER. The Senator from South Carolina admits the power of this Government to tax these institutions, but denies the power of including them within the compulsory provisions of a bankrupt law. Now is not the power as expressly granted in the Constitution in the one case as in the other? The Senator contends for their exemption on the ground that they are established for public purposes. But the banks themselves claim that they were established for private purposes, and deny the power of the State to revoke or annul their charters. The case of MacCulloch, in 9th Wheaton, expressly decided that the Bank of the United States was exempt from taxation by a State, because she was a fiscal agent of the General Government. In reply to the argument that banks in whole or in part owned by States, were State agents, he would say that if the officers of these banks were elected and paid by the State, and the State were responsible for their issues, then they might, with some plausibility, ask to be exempted from the operations of a bankrupt law.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, the officers of the State bank of Alabama were elected by the Legislature of the State, and they were as much the agents of the State, as the township officers were of the States in New England. Before Congress can apply the compulsory provisions of a bankrupt law to these institutions, they must first deny the power of the States to incorporate banks. They should come out boldly and advocate an exclusive metallic currency. He should not go with them in that, as he would not go for the present proposition. The Senator from Mississippi had alluded to the lamentable condition of the banks of Alabama. He was not willing that this Government should interfere in the affairs of his State, and especially those which were within the exclusive province of his State. What was the purport of this whole matter, but saying that the States were either unable or unwilling to manage their own affairs. The Senator alludes to the deplorable condition of these banks, and speaks of this Government as the only power which can correct the evil. He, (Mr. CLAY) for one, would be glad to see the Federal Government attend to its own affairs, and attend to them successfully. He thought the question had assumed no new shape since the brief discussion of yesterday, nor, indeed, since the last session, when he had moved to strike banks from the bill. As to the taxing power of this Government, he held it to be strictly limited to revenue purposes. Because the banks in Mississippi, or in Alabama, or in any other State, were in a bad condition, was with him no argument in favor of our travelling out of our constitutional sphere to apply a corrective.

Mr. SEVIER, having obtained the floor, said it must be apparent to every Senator that there was not the remotest chance of this bill passing Congress at the present session; and to prevent a further waste of the time of the Senate, he moved to lay the bill on the table.

Before the question was taken, a motion for adjournment was made, which prevailed; And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, February 9, 1841.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1841.

The SPEAKER informed Mr. JONES that this was the day set aside for the consideration of the bills relating to steamboat disasters, &c.

Mr. JONES would then ask that the special order be postponed until Thursday next, because all the important appropriation bills had yet to be acted upon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that if Thursday should be set aside for the special order, he would have no objection to its postponement until that day.

The question was then taken on postponing the special order, and decided in the affirmative.

So the special order was postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. C. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That on and after to-morrow, the daily hour of meeting of this House shall be eleven o'clock, until otherwise ordered.

Objection being made to the reception of the resolution,

On motion of Mr. C. JOHNSON, the rules were suspended; and

The question was taken on the passage of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative.

The House then, on the motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLIFFORD in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the

PENSION BILL.

The question pending was on the amendment offered by Mr. WADSWORTH THOMPSON on yesterday, appropriating $100,000 for the benefit of such Seminole chiefs and warriors as may surrender for emigration.

Mr. MARK A. COOPER being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday, in reply to Mr. GIDDINGS.

The latter having, at great length, attempted to show that the origin of the Florida war was attributable to slavery, kidnapping, &c. Mr. C. proceeded to reply seriatim to the arguments by which that position had been attempted to be sustained.

In the course of the remarks of Mr. C. allusion was made to the dispute between Georgia and Maine, in relation to the alleged kidnapping of certain negroes.

Mr. EVANS of Maine made several explanations on that subject, which will appear when the debate shall be written out.

Mr. COOPER was proceeding to comment upon that subject, when he was called to order by the CHAIR on the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. BLACK observed that his colleague was merely replying to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] had advanced yesterday; and inasmuch as that gentleman had been permitted to go on making charges, he (Mr. B.) could not conceive how his colleague could be out of order in replying to those charges. The gentleman from Ohio was permitted to make an anti-slavery speech on yesterday; and if the Chair decided that his colleague [Mr. COOPER] was not in order in replying to it, he (Mr. B.) would take an appeal from that decision.

The CHAIR observed that as the gentleman was referring to negro stealing in Ohio, and alluding to the object, &c. of those engaged, he had thought it his duty to call him to account for irrelevancy.

Mr. ADAMS said, yes; and in addition to that the gentleman from Georgia has made a pointed personal allusion to him; and he desired the gentleman might be permitted to go on, in order that he, Mr. A. might have an opportunity of answering him.

Mr. WISE desired to know if the gentleman from Georgia was not replying to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio on yesterday, on the subject of negro stealing. If so, was he not in order?

Mr. COOPER said, he had no notes of his own, and his remarks were founded on the notes he had taken of the written speech of the gentleman from Ohio; so that he was confining himself strictly to what had been said by that gentleman, and for which he had not been called to order by the CHAIR.

After some further explanations,

Mr. BLACK took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR.

And the question being taken on the appeal, the decision of the Chair was not sustained.

Mr. COOPER then resumed his remarks, and proceeded at great length to show that the conclusions drawn by the gentleman from Ohio, in relation to the causes of the Florida war, were erroneous. Mr. C. also, at some length, defended the State of Georgia from certain charges preferred against her by the Abolitionists.

Mr. BLACK said that when he finished his speech the other day, he did not think he would be called up so soon again to address the committee. But he would be derelict in his duty, not only as a Representative of Georgia, but as a citizen of the South, were he to permit the extraordinary speech made by the gentleman of Ohio to pass by in silence.

Mr. B. then proceeded to reply to Mr. GIDDINGS to show how those, the burden of whose song is "human rights and human liberty," in relation to Southern slaves, treat the free negroes who are residents of the non-slaveholding States. At Mr. B.'s request, many extracts were read from the Philanthropist, containing an article written by Mr. Jay, showing that, by the laws of Ohio, and many other of the free States, negroes were excluded from the elective franchise, the right of petition, from serving in the militia, from participating in the administration of justice, and that impediments were thrown into their way to debar them from the advantages of education, the enjoyment of religion, locomotion, &c. and the opinion of the writer [Mr. Jay] was that "Ohio stood pre-eminent for her wickedness against this class of her population."

Mr. B. was proceeding in his remarks, when he was called to order by several gentlemen, on the ground of irrelevancy in debate.

Mr. BYNUM hoped the gentleman from Georgia would be permitted to proceed. We had listened (said Mr. B.) the better part of the whole of yesterday to the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] against the slaveholders of the South and their institutions, which was calculated to do incurable injury to that portion of the Union. It was (said Mr. B.) the duty of every Representative from the South promptly to meet his assailants on that subject. If the gentleman from Georgia should be arrested in delivering his sentiments upon this vital and all-important subject, Mr. B. said that he himself, as a small portion of the South, would claim to be heard. It was a subject, beyond every other, in which the Southern people possessed the deepest interest, and one about which they had been more deceived, in his opinion, than about any other upon the face of the earth; and, to be undeceived, it was only necessary for them to do justice to themselves in this matter. Well might gentlemen be afraid of the truth, as to the position of parties, going forth from this place.

Mr. BLACK again resumed his remarks, and was proceeding farther to reply to Mr. GIDDINGS, when

Mr. RAYNER said, the discussion had gone far enough, and, in his opinion, it was only calculated to please a certain class of men in this House. Besides, the pension bill was before the committee, and the gentleman [Mr. BLACK] was discussing Abolition.

Mr. BYNUM said he knew whom the remarks of his colleague [Mr. RAYNER] were intended to reach; but he would say, well might certain gentlemen from the South wince, for this was, and ever must be, a tender subject to them. They were anxious (said Mr. B.) to arrest any discussion that would let the truth go to the South, and their position was becoming more evident.

Mr. BLACK resumed his remarks; and after frequent interruptions, said he held in his hand a portion of an ancient book. He meant the Bible itself. Now, sir, (remarked Mr. B.) call me to order with the Bible in my hand. I intend to read from the 7th chapter of Matthew, 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th verses. Mr. B. accordingly read as follows:

"1. Judge not, that ye be not judged.

"2. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.

"3. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

"4. Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and behold, a beam is in thine own eye.

"5. Thou hypocrite, [Mr. B. pointed to Mr. GIDDINGS] first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye."

Mr. B. contended that this passage of Scripture was applicable to Mr. GIDDINGS. We of the South (said Mr. B.) say we have no mote in our eye, neither on the subject of slavery or any other subject. I call upon the gentleman, in the language of Holy Writ, "Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then thou shalt see clearly to cast out the mote of thy brother's eye."

Mr. B. then concluded his remarks; not, however, without frequent interruptions on the ground of irrelevancy.

[The remarks of Mr. B. are in a course of preparation, and will be given hereafter.]

Mr. DOWNING of Florida, in a very animated manner, defended his constituents from the charges brought against them by Mr. GIDDINGS, of stealing negroes from the Indians, &c. He, Mr. D. denied that the gentleman from Ohio had substantiated his charges by a single proof.

Alluding to the ground taken by Mr. GIDDINGS on the Abolition question, Mr. D. observed that, if the Whigs of the South imagined that individual who came by the cars this morning, sanctioned those principles, they would have said to him, "be-gone forever." He, Mr. D. hoped it would not be understood by the country that the gentleman from Ohio was the representative, or the mouth piece on this subject of that great man (Harrison) who came from the same State. The gentleman ought to recollect that there were men of the Whig party acting with him on other subjects, who in this matter would not touch him with a pair of tongs.

Mr. D. concluded by urging the immediate ap-appropriation of the sum required by the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana then obtained the floor, but gave way to a motion that the committee rise.

On the question being taken, no quorum voted. The committee then rose, and reported that fact to the House.

A motion to adjourn was then made, and decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 62.

A call of the House was then simultaneously demanded by several members.

Mr. SMITH of Maine renewed the motion to adjourn, which prevailed.

And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 10, 1841.

On motion by Mr. HUBARD, the reading of the journal was dispensed with.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that the House was ready to receive the Senate, and to proceed to count the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, in conformity with the Constitution, and in pursuance of the joint resolution on that subject.

On motion by Mr. KNIGHT, the Senate proceeded to the hall of the House of Representatives, preceded by their Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms.

After the votes had been counted, the Senators returned to the Senate chamber, where the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of one member be appointed by the Senate to join a committee of two members to be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio, and inform him that he has been constitutionally elected by the electors of the several States President of the United States for four years from the 4th day of March, 1841.

Mr. PRESTON was appointed on the part of the Senate.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate do cause JOHN TYLER of Virginia to be notified that he has been duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years from the 4th of March, 1841.

THE VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, furnishing information from the Colonel of Ordnance, in relation to the National Armories.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to appoint trustees for the investment of the Smithsonian fund.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 10, 1841.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, by leave, presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Rhode Island, in favor of designating the same day throughout the United States for the choice of electors of President and Vice President; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK, by leave, presented a petition of John Randall and Charles York, sureties of Silas Holmes, deceased, late collector of the customs in the nineteenth collection district in the State of New York, praying to be released from all liabilities as sureties aforesaid; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LEET asked leave to present and have referred, the petitions of Benedict Reynolds and William Stephenson, of Washington county, Pennsylvania.

Objection being made, they could not be received according to the rules.

Mr. ANDREWS submitted the following, which was read for information:

Resolved, That at three o'clock to-morrow the debate upon the bill No. 529, making appropriation for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1841, in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, shall cease, and that the Committee shall, at that time, proceed to vote upon said bill and such amendments as may be offered thereto; and shall then report said bill, and such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee, to the House.

Objection being made to the reception of the resolution,

Mr. ANDREWS moved a suspension of the rules, and thereupon called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 114, nays 11.

So the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then modified, so as to read "twelve o'clock to-morrow."

Mr. ANDREWS moved the previous question; which was seconded, and

The main question was then put, and decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Gordonville, Orange county, to Madison Court House, Virginia.

Objection being made to the reception of the resolution,

Mr. BANKS moved to suspend the rules; but the motion was negatived.

Mr. LEET moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the morning hour of this day be appropriated to the presentation and reception of petitions.

Objection being made,

Mr. LEET moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. CARR wished to offer an amendment to the resolution, but

The SPEAKER informed him that the resolution was not open to amendment.

Mr. CARR said it was his intention to move that the call commence with Iowa.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and decided in the negative.

So the rules were not suspended.

Reports from committees were then called for, when

Mr. CRARY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported Senate bill with amendments, entitled "An act to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee, to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those States."

Mr. PECK moved to refer the bill, with the amendments, to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TURNEY hoped that the motion would not prevail, as it would defeat the measure. He desired that the bill be now taken up and passed; and could see no reason why it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GIDDINGS here asked the consent of the House to permit him to allude to a matter personal to himself. He wished to call attention to an article in the National Intelligencer of this morning, and said that the character of his constituents required it.

Mr. TURNEY objected, on the ground that there was another subject before the House.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that Mr. GIDDINGS have leave to proceed.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So leave was granted.

The article referred to by Mr. GIDDINGS was then read, as follows:

"Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina would appeal to the honorable member from Georgia to say whether it was prudent or proper, in this discussion of a topic (however improperly dragged into this debate) upon which every Southern man should only feel as a Southern man, to be provoking this family quarrel between Southern Whigs and Southern Democrats; and whether it is just to regard the very obscurest of the obscure members of the Whig party as an exponent of the feelings and opinions of that party on this subject. Would it not be better, more fair, and more just to wait one short month and hear the distinguished head of that party speak for himself? Mr. T. would pledge himself that Gen. Harrison will so speak and act upon the subject of Abolition as to satisfy even the member from Georgia, and to seal forever his lips, except in praise."

Mr. GIDDINGS said that he took the first occasion (after the member from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] had taken his seat,) to notice this subject. This he would not do, were the bearing of that gentleman's remarks confined to himself solely; but representing, as he (Mr. G.) did, a constituency as numerous and distinguished for their moral excellence as those represented by any other member, he could not pass by this matter in silence. The words (said Mr. G.) to which I allude, are printed in italics, and I suppose they are intended as a direct personal insult.

In reply to a remark of Mr. ALFORD, which was not heard by the Reporter,

Mr. G. said that it was related of a veteran marshal, who had grown old in the service of his country, and who had fought a hundred battles, that he happened to offend a young and fiery officer, who spat in his face for the purpose of insulting him. The General, taking his handkerchief from his pocket, and wiping his face, remarked: "If I could wash your blood from my soul as easily as I can this spittle from my face, you should not live another day."

I will (remarked Mr. G.) say to the member from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] that I claim no station superior to the most humble, nor inferior to the most exalted. In representing what I believe to be the views of my people, and what I deem their interests, and the interests of the North, I made the remarks I did; and, in answer to which, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOPER] made allusion to my district, and the vote given at the late Presidential election. In reply to this, the gentleman from South Carolina took it upon himself publicly to assign me a station, "the very obscurest of the obscure members of the Whig party." I say to the member, that at the North we have a different mode of punishing insults from what exists at the South. With us, the man who wantonly assails another, is punished by public sentiment. To that sentiment I appeal. It will do justice both to the member and myself.

Mr. THOMPSON said that if the member from Ohio had understood him as reflecting upon his constituents, he (Mr. T.) was very sure no other member had. Mr. T. sat for hours listening to the coarse insults of the member from Ohio upon the whole South. He would not say that he had withered under those insults; on the contrary, they had produced no such effect; and, if he had been in the place of the member from Georgia, [Mr. COOPER] he should have treated the remarks of the member from Ohio with a sovereign, profound, and silent contempt. He had seen the almost universal disapprobation of the course of that member amongst the new members from the non-slaveholding States—a disapprobation almost as general and as strong as that of the members from the South. As to the estimation in which he (Mr. T.) held that member, this was a matter of taste; and Mr. T. believed that if an issue on the whole subject were presented to the House, the opinion which he had expressed would be sustained.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia said he only wanted to disclaim one thing on a point on which Mr. THOMPSON's were predicated concerning the gentleman from Ohio; and that is, said Mr. C. that I never did, in word, deed, or thought, charge upon the Whigs, as a party, that which the gentleman says I did.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate then announced the state of the vote to the two Houses of Congress in joint meeting assembled, and declared that William Henry Harrison of Ohio, having a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the fourth day of March next, 1841; and that John Tyler of Virginia, having a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing with the fourth day of March next, 1841.

The joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress was then dissolved, and the Senate returned to its chamber.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Joint Committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode for ascertaining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of certifying the persons elected of their election, presenting the following in continuation of their report:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate, to be appointed by that body to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, to wait on WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON of Ohio, and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1841.

Mr. PRENTISS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, being taken up as in committee of the whole—

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said he wished to say a few words on the bill generally, and therefore he should be glad if the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] would withdraw his motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. BENTON said he too wished to say something on the bill.

Mr. SEVIER consented to withdraw his motion.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut proceeded to speak in reply to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] He denied that the bankrupt law could be made to extend to the New England corporate bodies, to which the Senator from South Carolina had alluded, whose constitution and powers he explained and elucidated. They were public corporations, acting as public functionaries for the carrying out of the designs of the Government, some of them with limited legislative authority, and therefore they could neither be taxed nor made subject to a bankrupt law. Again, he denied the existence of the distinction which had been attempted to be drawn between the banks which were State property and the banks which were individual property. The court had decided that if a State mingled with individuals and participated with them in the ordinary business of individuals, it was, in effect, a dispensation with its public character, and the assumption of that of an individual. To form a currency was an attribute of sovereignty; and would any one say that because these banks were State property, they were of a governmental character? The creation of a currency this Government had taken to itself; the States had surrendered the power, and the States cannot exercise that power if they would. But if they could, such power would be political in its nature, and its exercise would require a political organization by authority of the people. The true character of banks had been lost sight of in this argument; if it had been borne in mind, no gentleman would say that they ought to be excluded from the operation of this bill, for they were neither of a public nor of a civil and municipal character. If banks could be excluded on the ground of their public character, for the same reason might some incorporated mercantile firms be excluded, as might also other classes of corporated persons, whose business required legislative regulation. There were turnpike roads, and ferries, and markets, and grist mills, and various others, that were regulated by legislative authority, because they were connected with the public interest; they were as much under legislative control as banks; and could any one say because they were regulated and controlled by legislative authority for the public interest, they were excluded from the operation of a bankrupt law of a public character. He again dissented from the Senator from South Carolina, who said these banks could not be included in the operation of a bankrupt law, inasmuch as they were not traders; and he contended that they, as traders in commercial paper, were as much within the obligations of the law as any other class of traders. But he objected to this bill as inexpedient, and as objectionable in its character. It was, in fact, an ex post facto law. He was aware the Supreme Court of the United States had decided that a prohibited ex post facto law was in its character of a criminal law only; but he (Mr. Smith) contended that it was equally unconstitutional in respect to civil as to criminal transactions; and what was this bankrupt bill but an ex post facto law, intended to operate on past mercantile and trading transactions, and on contracts under which property was parted with, without reference to such an enactment, which would be as unjust as to charge, by legislative enactment, the rate of interest on loans made antecedently? Now such a law should only operate, as in chancery practice, on contracts made and unfulfilled, for the reason that the contract was defective, and could not be carried out. But he thought such a law was objectionable also, as it would place the honest trader at the mercy of the dishonest; as it would put the goods of the prudent and industrious creditor in the hands of the improvident and extravagant, who would thereby be encouraged to run into debt; and for these and other various reasons which he gave, he objected to the passage of this bill.

At the close of his remarks, the Senate went into Executive session.

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 11, 1841.

After the journal had been read, Mr. STANLEY was excused from serving on the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings.

It appeared by the reading of the journal this morning, that Mr. CUSHING and Mr. WISE were appointed on the part of this House of the joint committee to wait on General WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON and notify him of his election as President of the United States. Mr. PRESTON is of the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. EVERETT, by leave, presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, in relation to the late New Jersey contested election case; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the Pension bill.

The SPEAKER said there were two conflicting orders before the House, viz: the steamboat bills, and the resolution adopted yesterday, on motion of Mr. ANDREWS, that, at twelve o'clock to-day, the debate on the Pension bill shall cease, and that the Committee of the Whole shall, at that time, proceed to vote upon said bill, and such amendments as may be offered thereto; and shall then report said bill, and such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee, to the House. The SPEAKER said that the only way to dispose of these orders would be by devoting the morning hour to the consideration of the steamboat bills.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to postpone the consideration of the steamboat bills until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. GALBRAITH would prefer Monday next.

Mr. MORGAN suggested Tuesday, the 16th inst. Monday being petition day.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the consideration of the steamboat bills was postponed until Tuesday next.

PENSION BILL.

On the motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLIFFORD in the Chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1841. The question pending was the amendment to the bill, offered by Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, to appropriate one hundred thousand dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the benefit of such of the Seminole chiefs and warriors as may surrender for emigration.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana being entitled to the floor, observed, that in the few remarks he had to make, he should not go out of his way to travel over the ground occupied by many other gentlemen. Neither would he make any attack upon the member from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] He would endeavor to confine himself to the business before the committee.

The question was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] to the pension bill. He, Mr. S. regretted that the passage of that bill should be delayed a single moment, as it was due to the country that it should pass immediately. But, inasmuch as the amendment had been introduced, he deemed it his duty to say a few words in opposition to it.

After some further remarks, Mr. S. proceeded to say that he believed the Florida war originated on justifiable grounds, but whether that war had been prosecuted so vigorously as it ought to have been, he would not then pretend to discuss. He had understood that it had been the object of the Government to bring the war to a close in a way honorable to a warlike power. But now, in the last days of the present Administration, a proposition is made by one of the opposite party to buy out those Indians. He, Mr. S. believed it the duty of the Government to bring these Indians to an unconditional submission, and not to bring the war to a close by giving them money, ammunition, &c. He did not think this course proper for ending the war, and more especially as all the obloquy would be thrown upon the present Administration.

Mr. S. then alluded to the remarks of Mr. W. THOMPSON in introducing the amendment, and reminded that gentleman that, in the coming Administration, they would have a hero—a war king—at the head of it, under whose direction, if report was true, there could be no difficulty in bringing these Indians to unconditional submission.

Mr. S. after expressing at some length his opinion that there was no danger of a war with Great Britain, as anticipated by the member from South Carolina, went on to say that he wanted the war in Florida ended, but ended in an honorable way. Rather than it should be terminated in any other way, he was willing to entail it upon the coming Administration, and if they chose to fight it out, then let them have all the glory. But if they should think proper to buy the Indians out, then let them have all the infamy.

But if the Indians were already "coming in" so fast, where was the necessity for buying them out.

After some remarks in reply to the speech of Mr. PROFFIT on a former day, Mr. S. concluded by submitting the following amendment:

"Provided, That money hereby appropriated shall be charged and considered as advanced payment on the part of the United States to the Seminoles under the provisions of the treaty held at Payne's Landing on the 9th day of May, 1832."

Mr. BRIGGS was surprised at the course taken by the gentleman from Indiana. The proposition for thus ending the war came from the Secretary of War himself, and it fell upon his (Mr. B's) ears with full satisfaction.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the CHAIR announced that the discussion, in pursuance of the resolution adopted yesterday, must terminate.

Mr. B. concluded by sending to the Clerk's table the following letters, which were read for information:

"HEAD QUARTERS ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
"Tampa, January 26, 1841.

"SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have now within the chain of sentinels at this post 150 Indians. Ten of that number are of the Mickasukies, and the balance of the Tallahassee tribe. This I view in a favorable light, as their principal chief, Echo-Emathla is with them, and they have stated that their object in coming in is for the purpose of emigrating. Runners of the Mickasukie tribe have been sent out from Forts Clinch and No. 4, who have reported that they could bring in fifty or sixty of their band. They are daily expected here.

"Should this result prove favorable, it will be a leading feature in terminating this war, particularly as it is combined with the arrival yesterday of a party of Seminoles, from Pease creek, under charge of my Aid-de-Camp, Lieutenant L. A. Armistead, 6th infantry.

"It is much to be feared that it will take some time before any others in that portion of the country will be induced to come in, notwithstanding every exertion on my part has been made to induce them to do so; but I shall still continue to negotiate with hopes of success.

"So far as it relates to the Tallahassee, appearances are favorable, provided no disappointment occurs from the promises and stipulations which I have made them, and which I trust will be complied with on the part of the Government. These stipulations were detailed in my communication to the Department on the 16th inst. and I am convinced that, had money been furnished me at an early period, this war would have been terminated, as these people have but little faith in promises.

"I have just concluded a talk with Echo-Emathla, the Chief of the Tallahassee, who says that the remainder of his people will be in two or three weeks—many of them are in Middle Florida. He has sent runners out to them with a talk, which will, no doubt, induce them to meet him at this post in twenty days.

"I have despatched in a steamboat my Assistant Adjutant General to Key Biscayne to conduct to his post the thirty-two Indians captured by Lieutenant Colonel Harney in the Everglades. On their arrival I shall ship them with those now here, making in the whole 180, for their new homes in Arkansas, on the 15th proximo.

"Enclosed I transmit reports from Lt. Col. Clarke and Lt. Col. Loomis.

"I am, sir, &c.

"W. K. ARMISTEAD,

"Brigadier Gen. Com. Army in Florida.

"Hon. J. R. POINSETT, Secretary of War.

"Endorsed.—Respectfully transmitted to the Hon. WADY THOMPSON, jr. for his information, and that of the Committee on Military Affairs, by his obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT."

"War Department, Feb. 10, 1841.

"At Fort Brooke, Tampa Bay, there are now in 30 Indians. At Fort Clinch, on the Withlacoochee, Echo-Emathla has come in with 41 Tallahassee Indians, and at Fort Annutalaga Tiger Tail with 33. Colonel Clark's command, which left Tampa a short time since for the Withlacoochee to escort in a party of Indians, is expected to return to Tampa on the 20th of January. Col. Clarke has with him 32 Indians, mostly Tallahassee, and several Mickasukies.

"The steamer T. Salmon left Tampa on the 19th instant for Key Biscayne for 30 Indians, (Spanish Indians,) the women and children of the party captured by Col. Harney a short time since.

"At Fort Amistead, eleven Indians are in. At Pease's Creek several families are expected to meet a conveyance sent there to convey them to Tampa. Forty Indians have come in at Fort King, and 4 at No. 4 near Cedar Keys, and 19 more have since gone in to Fort Clinch.

"In all there are now at the different posts 240 Indians to be brought together at Tampa Bay as soon as practicable, under sufficient escorts for emigration to Arkansas in the early part of February. Of the 60 Indians at Fort Clinch, 40 are warriors, and of the whole 240, probably 80 or 90 are warriors.

"By letters from Cedar Keys, it appears 72 Indians have gone in recently to Fort King. Rumor says Col. Reily came on with a party of 40 or 50, who have passes, and they went into Fort King with him. By good information I have heard Col. Harney has a second time captured 12 Indians.

"By a letter received from Mr. Hernandez, a member of the Legislative Council of Florida, it appears that Col. Harney has fallen in with the Indians a third time, and has captured 115.

"If these rumors are true, and they are at least extremely probable, there are nearly 500 Indians who have surrendered, and are ready for emigration. More Indians have been killed by the operations in Florida during the past eight months than for two years before.

CHARLES McCORMICK,
"Asst. Surg. U. S. Army."

The question then being on the amendment of Mr. SMITH to the amendment of Mr. THOMPSON,

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina wished to submit the following as a further amendment:

"SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the removal, subsistence, and benefit of such of the Seminole Indian chiefs and warriors as may surrender for emigration.

"SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That no rifles, or arms of any kind, shall be delivered to said Indians until they reach the western bank of the Mississippi river."

Mr. W. THOMPSON modified his amendment so as to include the above.

The question then being on the amendment of Mr. SMITH, it was put and decided in the negative.

The question then being on the amendment of Mr. THOMPSON, as modified, it was agreed to.

After the rejection of two proposed amendments by Messrs. CRAB and CAVE JOHNSON, as not in order,

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the committee rose and reported the bill as amended to the House.

And the question being on agreeing to the amendment,

Mr. PETRIKIN rose to inquire of the Chair whether the amendment reported was in order.

The CHAIR said it was not for him to decide as to the competency of the Committee of the Whole as to their amendments. The House could however vote such amendments down, if it thought proper.

Mr. WARREN, after some introductory remarks, expressed himself in favor of the amendment, and said that, in his opinion, $100,000 only was necessary to put an end to the war and secure the peace of the people. He could not see how the honor and dignity of the nation could, in the least degree, be compromised by appropriating the money for the purpose specified. Mr. W. having concluded his remarks,

Mr. JAMESON moved the previous question, which was ordered; and,

The question now being on agreeing to the amendment,

Mr. DROMGOOLE thereupon called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 158, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Blackwell, Bond, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, Connor, W. R. The bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading, and was read by the Clerk, as follows:

A BILL making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensions of the United States, for the year eighteen hundred and forty-one, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby appropriated, in addition to former appropriations, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the pensioners of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-one;

For the Revolutionary pensions under the act of the eighteenth of March, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, three hundred and fourteen thousand dollars;

For the payment of invalid pensions, one hundred and seventy thousand dollars;

For pensions to widows and orphans under the act of the fourth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, four hundred and forty-eight thousand two hundred and forty one dollars;

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That no rifles, or arms of any kind, shall be delivered to said Indians until they reach the western bank of the Mississippi river.

The question now being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. JAMESON moved the previous question; which was ordered.

And on the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was passed.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BELL in the chair,) and took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841.

Some explanations took place between Messrs. CRAB and JONES, of Virginia, in relation to the item appropriating $35,000 "for stationery, fuel, printing, and all other contingent expenses of the Senate," after which,

Mr. LINCOLN called upon the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. JONES) to produce any estimates, if he had any, in relation to the following item:

"For stationery, fuel, printing, and all other contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, $25,000."

Mr. JONES replied that he had no estimates beyond those which had been furnished by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. STANLY was understood to inquire whether the stationery for which money was now to be appropriated had been purchased.

Mr. ANDERSON called for the estimates referred to.

Mr. JONES sent to the Clerk's table a statement from the Clerk, containing the estimates referred to, amongst which was the item of $10,000 for the purchase of stationery for the next Congress.

Mr. LINCOLN then moved to reduce the above sum of $25,000 to $15,000—i. e. striking out the $10,000 for stationery for the next Congress.

Mr. LINCOLN, after stating that the House would bear him witness that he had not yielded to that senseless cry of economy which denied such just appropriations as might be required to carry on the various branches of the public business, proceeded to comment upon the abuses which had crept into this system of contingent expenditures. He believed that all those abuses which had crept into the administration of the public trusts of the country had their source in abuses under the head of contingencies.

As one instance of the mode in which the money of the contingent fund had been expended, Mr. L. alluded to a request made to the Committee on Public Lands to print a report of the Commissioner on Public Lands, the expense of which, it was affirmed, would not exceed two or three hundred dollars. A few days afterwards, however, an estimate was submitted by the Clerk to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, asking an appropriation of fifteen thousand dollars.

After specifying other instances, Mr. L. expressed his belief that it was time to inquire whether it was necessary to expend $150,000 a year for contingent expenses over and above pay and mileage. The House had no control over these expenditures of its contingent funds. The Committee of Accounts had no control over them; the bills were paid and receipted before they were laid before the committee, and when it was too late to do any thing in regard to them. Hence it followed that whenever the Clerk of this House, without control or accountability, saw fit to apply the funds, the House had nothing to do but to ratify and sanction his acts. There ought, in Mr. L.'s opinion, to be some committee appointed which should have charge of these matters before the expenditures were made.

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York addressed the committee at much length on the subject of the abuses which had crept into this branch of the public expenditures, and of the gross impositions that had been practised in the form of enormous prices paid for paper; of contracts made with sub-agents; of lithography, &c. declaring his own freedom from responsibility in these matters, as a member of the Committee of Accounts, by reason of the peculiar constitution of that committee.

Mr. J. animadverted upon the conduct of the Clerk in not attending personally to the purchase of stationery and other articles. Mr. J. contended that if the Clerk had so acted, instead of employing Mr. Langtree, a saving of ten thousand dollars a year might have been made to Government in the single article of stationery alone. If the Clerk had gone himself to Philadelphia or New York, and charged his expenses, that would have comported with the spirit of the joint resolution. But when Mr. Langtree was employed as a sub-agent, he assumed the character of a stationer, and went to New York, where, as such, he procured paper at the wholesale prices, and resold it to Congress at an immense profit. Now, observed Mr. J. if the Clerk had gone himself, with the money in his hand, he might have procured the paper at the same prices, and without subjecting the Government to the additional charge of Mr. Langtree, or his profit.

He (Mr. J.) objected against the employment of any third person by the Clerk. It was a violation of every principle of our Government for an agent thus to delegate his power to a third person.

After a recapitulation of what had been done by the Committee on Accounts on this subject at the last session, Mr. J. proceeded to particularize some of the articles on which the sub-agent of the Clerk, Mr. Langtree, derived his profit, and which profit would have been a gain to the Government had the Clerk performed the duty himself. Mr. J. said that the letter paper was charged at $6 50 per ream, when a better article could be purchased for cash for $4 50 per ream.

There was another most extraordinary circumstance attending this matter. He (Mr. J.) understood that the paper manufacturers were always ready to furnish ruled paper when required, at an additional price of fifty cents per ream. But under this sub-agency system, we were not only charged $6 50 per ream for paper, which could be bought at $4 50, but we were charged $1 25 more per ream for ruling!

Mr. J. then proceeded to state that a thousand reams of paper had been brought to the House and stowed away, more than would be wanted at the present Congress. The whole amount was eighteen hundred reams, only eight hundred of which was required. He had been informed that the excuse of Mr. Langtree was, that he (Mr. L.) had misunderstood the order of the Clerk, mistaking eight hundred for eighteen hundred reams. Mr. J. here made some severe comments on this mode of doing business, first paying an enormous price for paper, and then in addition to that, losing the interest on the money by receiving paper which would not be required for a year to come.

The Clerk had no right to order stationery for the next Congress. If he was permitted to do it, why then he had the same right to order it for a half a century ahead.

After adverting to what appeared to him the extraordinary high bills of the Clerk for his expenses while at New York in attending to the sale of damaged stationery, Mr. J. proceeded to notice the several impositions practised upon the Government in relation to lithography, and as an instance of such abuses, mentioned a case, where the House had been charged a high amount for lithography, when not a single sheet of it had ever been received, the whole having been consumed by fire.

Mr. PROFFIT stated that, on a calculation made by him, he found that the stationery bill for this session alone was about $25,000, which was at the rate of $103 for every member of the House. He was satisfied that $20 would pay the stationery bill of every gentleman this year, and he hoped that some member, better skilled in these things, would make an estimate and submit it to the action of the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that some years ago he was on a committee appointed to investigate into the stationery accounts of the House; and, after a minute examination, the committee had come to the conclusion that there was but one remedy, and that was to pursue the course suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT.] He (Mr. U.) had intended to suggest to the committee a proposition that "in lieu of stationery and newspapers, each member of Congress should be allowed $—annually." The committee could fill us the blank with any sum that might be computed to be proper. This was the only remedy. The same complaints had been made year after year, and would continue to be made until the end of time unless some such plan as this were adopted.

Mr. JONES of Virginia gave to the committee such information as had been in possession of the Committee of Ways and Means in regard to these estimates, and stated that the estimates of the Clerk had been reduced, in the committee, $25,000 below the amount contained in those which had been read at the Clerk's table. The committee had supposed that the amount now asked for was about the proper sum, and in that they had looked with a proper eye to economy—an object which he was as desirous to promote, when it could be properly done, as any other gentleman. Mr. J. then replied to certain portions of the argument of Mr. JOHNSTON, contending that blame, if blame there was, should rest in the proper quarter, and that it did not belong where the gentleman had laid it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia also replied to the remarks of Mr. JOHNSTON of New York. He said that the Committee of Accounts had taken pains to examine into the subject; and, after receiving letters from various stationers, had come to the conclusion that the price paid by Government was a just equivalent; and they also found that there had been an absolute reduction in the price. So far from being deceived in the purchase of the paper, the committee came to the conclusion that it had been purchased upon the best terms.

After some remarks by Messrs. JOHNSON of Virginia, JOHNSTON of New York, LINCOLN, and GRINNELL,

Mr. GRAHAM said, that the sum of $100,000 had already been appropriated for these specific objects. Economy and charity ought to begin at home; and Mr. G. moved to amend the amendment by striking out the whole item of $25,000, as the only way of putting an end to the abuses which were undoubtedly practised.

Mr. EVERETT said, there were two modes at present by which the extravagance in the finances of the House could be arrested. The first was to adopt the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GRAHAM.] He (Mr. E.) had put a question to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] in regard to the amount of stationery now on hand. He (Mr. E.) believed there was enough to carry them through this season, and for the commencement of the next.

Another mode within the power of the House was to bring in a resolution to proceed in the election of Clerk. It was a course which every department took, where it was found that persons in charge of funds had misapplied them. This he would do, were it not for the late period of the session.

But he disapproved of making general laws in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MORGAN said he believed that there was much more stationery on hand than would be required for the next Congress. If the appropriation should be made, the Clerk would make another journey to New York. Mr. M. was of opinion that the fact could be established, that the Clerk made a charge of $200 for his journey to New York, about the time when he delivered his speech at Castle Garden. Mr. M. was opposed to giving further power to the present Clerk, because he had no confidence that that officer would do justice to the House, or make its purchases with economy; and he gave notice that he would, at the proper time, offer the following amendment:

"And in the future delivery of stationery of every description to members of the House, the postmaster shall keep an account of the articles delivered to each member, with the prices thereof; and the Clerk of the House shall insert in his annual report of the contingent expenses, the aggregate amount of the value of stationery received by the members respectively."

Mr. FLOYD, a member of the Committee of Accounts, went into some statements relative to the action of that committee, and insisted that the contract for stationery, made by the present Clerk, was better and far more economical for the Government than the practice which prevailed before he came into office. Besides, stationers who had been consulted upon this subject, had expressed their opinion that the prices paid for the stationery were very reasonable.

As to the motion to strike out the appropriation, he (Mr. F.) had no objection to it, and supposed that the Clerk had not.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS, after some remarks, said he understood that Mr. Ames of Springfield, Massachusetts, would have furnished paper of as good a quality as that purchased by the Clerk, at half price.

Mr. BURKE said that Mr. Ames's testimony before the committee was of an entirely different character from that stated.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS inquired of Mr. BURKE at what price Mr. Ames offered to dispose of his paper.

Mr. BURKE said he did not know exactly, but he was confident Mr. Ames had placed no such price as one-half. Mr. B. further remarked that there were several samples, made by different paper makers, submitted to Mr. Ames. Some samples he offered to supply at fifty cents less per ream; others he rated higher than the price paid by the Clerk.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS supported at some length the motion of Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. TILLINGHAST also expressed his desire to vote for the amendment of Mr. GRAHAM, though he did not wish to vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN.]

Mr. LINCOLN here said that his only object in submitting his motion was to bring the matter to the consideration of the House, and, that being done, he would now accept the amendment of Mr. GRAHAM as a modification of his own.

And the question being on the amendment as modified—

Mr. TILLINGHAST then gave notice of his intention, if the amendment failed, to offer the following:

"And nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize or sanction any contract for stationery or other articles of merchandise for the use of the ensuing Congress, by any officer of the present Congress, to an amount exceeding in the whole two thousand dollars."

Mr. ADAMS sent to the Clerk's table a letter from Mr. W. J. Stone of this city, relative to the prices paid for lithography.

The letter (Mr. A. said) was rather collateral to the question; he had had it in his possession for three months, but had had no opportunity of pre-sending it; and (he was understood to add) he despaired of doing any good by presenting it.

The letter was then read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, December, 1840.

SIR: I perceive by a resolution of the House, offered by Mr. Davis of Indiana, that 5,000 copies of Mr. Owen's geological report is likely to be ordered to be printed with the maps properly engraved. There is no doubt that an effort will be made to alter the resolution, so as to have the maps lithographed instead of engraved. The House is laboring under a mistake as to the relative price of lithographing and engraving. It appears on examination of Mr. P. Haas's accounts in the Treasury, that he has charged the House 50 per cent. more for lithographing than I have charged for engraving. This should not be so. Lithography, as executed by him, is not worth one-half what engraving is, consequently he has been receiving four prices for his work. Could a committee who fare somewhat conversant with such matters be appointed to investigate the subject, it would cause but little delay or trouble to obtain facts that would enable the House to act knowingly. As things are at present, through misrepresentation, Congress are deprived of the advantage of having their work done properly. If the Clerk would receive proposals from competent engravers, this difficulty would be obviated. The proposals should specify the time in which the work was required to be furnished, and a sample deposited of the style required, otherwise a favorite might have work executed by very indifferent workmen at a low price, and make a great profit to the entire exclusion of skilful workmen. Besides, the work might be sent to a foreign country to be executed, as has already been the case. If the House would employ me to furnish the maps for Mr. Owen's report, I will do so for 50 per cent. less than Mr. P. Haas has heretofore charged the House for lithography, which is my usual price for work accompanying documents. Should Congress deem the subject of sufficient importance to appoint a committee, it would be well to examine the accounts for engraving done for the Senate.

Very respectfully, yours,

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, W. J. STONE.
House of Representatives.

Mr. BYNUM said he should vote to strike out the whole of the appropriation for stationery, not because he thought it proper, but because he thought it necessary to bring gentlemen back to a proper sense of what was due from them as Representatives on that floor, and to the great interests of the people of this country. He thought nothing less than meeting this question in this way, by stopping all appropriations, and consequently the wheels of Government, and throwing the responsibility upon those gentlemen at once who were embarrassing almost every measure that was brought forward by either party, by an ostentatious parade of a boastful economy, and a most indiscriminate censure of every public officer. Why, sir, said Mr. B. do gentlemen not know, from the very nature of things, that as long as you have a Government, you must have officers, for it is of such that Governments consist; and can gentlemen expect that Governments can be sustained and carried on in all their operations without expense or money, and those officers are to serve without pay for their services? Such an idea appeared to him a preposterous absurdity—yet one might well infer this, from the tenor of the remarks of gentlemen and their course on this floor. Gentlemen ought to recollect, that in a short month, they would have an opportunity of trying how far it was practicable to carry on this Government without either officers or money. They should recollect too, that they should be tried by the same rule which they laid down for the trial of others. He was not prepared to say how far the conduct of the Clerk of the House had been proper or improper; upon that subject we had contradictory evidence from the members of the same committee, who professed to know most about it; in favor of fact, there were two to one in favor of the proper conduct of the Clerk of the House—yet it appeared that the House was called upon, and by those too who appeared to know the least about it, to cast an unmerited censure upon the Clerk, and this too upon the most insufficient evidence of hearsay. Now, this was the principal subject that he had risen to notice, and against the course pursued in relation to it, he entered his most solemn protest—a course that had been adopted during this and the last Administration against the public officers of every department of the Government; which, in his judgment, was as unjust (he would not say dishonorable) as it was illiberal and unstatesmanlike. Sir, said he, what was that course that had become of late so much in practice in this House? It was that the most inexperienced of the members, who had not been in their seats long enough to become acquainted with the most ordinary modes of the transaction of business, either by the officers of the House or the heads of the Departments, had attempted to make themselves leaders of their respective parties, by arraigning and denouncing every officer in your Government for corruption, misstatement, malfeasance, &c. arising, nine times out of ten, out of their own want of experience upon those subjects, and their inability to understand them. Such has been emphatically the case pursued in this House for the last several years, by which your old, experienced, gray-haired men, have been thrown entirely in the back grounds, or they have been woefully derelict and negligent in their duty to their constituents; and some of your best public officers have been condemned by the public without a hearing, and before being called on even for the slightest explanation, which might have been the fullest justification of their statements and conduct: and thus have gone abroad many of the most unfounded and unjust imputations against the best of men, without a contradiction. He put it to the candor of gentlemen, if such a course was fair? Was it honorable? Was it just or statesmanlike? Would it not be revisited on gentlemen with retributive justice? and, if so, could they, with any grace, complain?

Again, he contended that it was a practice both unstatesmanlike and unparliamentary—of recent date, adopted to effect party purposes. Heretofore, it had been the case when the conduct of an officer was impeached or assailed, a special committee was appointed to examine into, and report the fact to the House, or an explanation called for by the House from the accused, before either condemnation or denunciation by the members of this body, by whom he was to be tried. But how different now, when condemnation and denunciation always precedes either trial, explanation in justification, or defence; and conviction is entered upon some second or third handed hearsay? For instance, your Clerk is ordered to supply materials for stationery to this House. It is presumable that he does it at as reasonable a rate as the nature of the case admits of. After it is done, some "Yankee nutmeg maker," perhaps, writes to some member of the House that had been applied to, or elected Clerk to the House, he would have furnished those materials at a much cheaper rate than your present Clerk has furnished them. Without doubting this statement—without calling on your Clerk for any explanation—without calling on a committee to report the facts to the House, you call up your Clerk, with a character heretofore unimpeached and unimpeachable, and upon such evidence denounce, censure, and convict him. Sir, against the adoption of such a course against any officer, I protest, as being cruel, unjust, and tyrannical. It was a practice repugnant to every principle of liberty, and could only be tolerated by usurpers and tyrants.

Mr. EVANS contended that this fund (the estimates for which had already been reduced $25,000 by the Committee of Ways and Means) was not more than sufficient to meet the demands that would be made upon it; and he repudiated, with much animation, the charges which the House made against itself in the shape of corruption and plunder.

He did not say there might not have been individual instances of abuse. If any man has been guilty of that, it was his own matter. But he did not believe that the unjust appropriations of stationery amounted, in a long session, to more than three thousand dollars. His experience was that there was no such waste, and plundering, and extravagance as they were charging themselves with. He was opposed to striking out the appropriation; it was no more than was necessary. The estimate, as he had stated, had already been reduced $25,000 in the Committee of Ways and Means, and that, he thought, was what the Secretary of the Treasury would call a very "vigorous reduction." If gentlemen were willing to dispense with stationery altogether, so was he—vastly more willing than he was to receive $20 for his share, or to put a law upon the statute book denouncing themselves.

Mr. MONROE thanked the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] for his speech; it contained precisely his own sentiments, though much better expressed. The gentleman deserved the thanks of this House for the manner in which he had vindicated his character and dignity.

Mr. UNDERWOOD replied to Mr. EVANS, explaining and vindicating his own course, and contending that that gentleman's argument amounted only to this—let us not put this thing on the statute books; if we are guilty of these offences, let not the eye of any man see it. He could assure the gentleman that the people were not ignorant of these matters—that they were turning their attention to them. It was a mistake to suppose that these things were too trifling to demand attention. Nothing could be so which involved an abuse of the people's money. He denied that he had said or done any thing calculated to reflect upon any man. He had denounced no one as a plunderer. He had merely suggested to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFER] a way by which the abuse could be remedied.

The question was discussed further by Messrs. TILLINGHAST, EVERETT, and LINCOLN.

Mr. LINCOLN said that, on subsequent examination, he found that his original motion was the proper one; and again modified his proposition so as to reduce the item from $25,000 to $15,000, (i. e. striking out all that was applicable to the next session of Congress.)

And the question being taken, the amendment, thus modified, was agreed to.

So the item was reduced from $25,000 to $15,000.

Mr. CURTIS then moved that the committee rise.

The motion having prevailed, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. BURKE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special committee, appointed by order of the House at the last session on the subject of stationery, and the memorial of the Clerk, be re-appointed.

Mr. STANLY said he had something to say in relation to the doings of the committee proposed to be revived, and which he should take an opportunity of saying when the resolution came up for consideration.

And the House adjourned till to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

IN SENATE.

Mr. BENTON said, he was willing to borrow money for the use of the Government, but not to authorize it to make paper money; and he would therefore call for the ayes and noes, which were accordingly ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 12, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. CUSHING, from the Joint Committee appointed on the part of the House to wait on WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio, and inform him of his election to the Presidency of the United States, reported: That the committee had waited on the President elect, and informed him of the result of the vote; when he replied, that he received this manifestation of the confidence of his countrymen with profound gratitude, and that he would earnestly devote himself to the discharge of the duties imposed on him, by endeavoring to promote the union and welfare of the country, according to his best abilities.

Mr. BURKE, in pursuance of notice, offered by following resolution:

Mr. TURNEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following REPORT.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Holt, report:

That in the month of September, 1799, petitioner, at the circuit court, in the State of Connecticut, was indicted and found guilty of having printed and published what was alleged to be a libel against Mr. John Adams, the then President of the United States, the alleged libel was in the following words, to wit: "The officers of the new corps met in Danbury, and assigned the stations for each in which to enlist soldiers as recruits. The newspapers also announce that the President has directed the additional regiments to be organized. In so serious a crisis, I trust that a few remarks will not be amiss. A question arises, where are these recruits for a standing army to be found? Among our sprightly and enterprising young farmers, who, by industry and economy, may grow rich, become fathers of families, and men of great respectability as husbandmen in the immense regions which are cultivating in the West? No: they are ready in their places to do military duty at the risk of life, in order to ward off invasion, or to crush intestine tumults. But they will never give their leave to the Prussian military discipline, or devote their valor to promote the views of ambition, or to oppress their country and posterity with a standing army. They will never be the companions of the refuse of mankind, taken from gaols and brothels, from Tyburn and Newgate; they will never spend their best days in armies and vice, in order to glitter in regimentals, wear a sword, and lounge in idleness as drones, puffed and penniless. The best comment upon the recruiting service and address to the manly feelings of American youth, is the appointment of Alexander Hamilton to command our army after the affair of crim. con. Isprelude to our President's advice to the young men of Philadelphia, to study virtue and science, is an instance of human fallibility and inconsistency. Are we young officers and soldiers to learn virtue of General Hamilton; or, like their General, are they to be found in the bed of adultery? This is a serious consideration for statesmen, for the army, for fathers, brothers, husbands, and sons. Officers in recruiting services are generally successful; but soldiers are not very fit for service under seventeen or eighteen years; such may serve John Quincy Adams when he is lord protector of the United States, but cannot defend us in the present case in actual service, especially on the frontiers and among the female Indians. Officers are not always moral or careful to provide for the first of their amours. This must enforce the obligation for the sake of morality, to discourage standing armies in the nation. No men are treated with less respect and deference at this time than those who are parading in regimentals, and recruiting in our country towns and cities. The people consider them as useless and burdensome, as idle and dissipated, and they are too noble to forsake honorable industry to feed upon the vitals of their country, to extend court influence, or to be allured and bribed into silence. When they are not preferred in promotions, neglected military men generally become foes to that cause which neglects to employ them, and the enormous number who are now soliciting, if they become unfriendly to our Executive, will give an almost total change to the next election, unless commissions and pay are bestowed on them. The people, see and feel this in every part of the country. Our war advocates are, therefore, anxious for hostilities. The war and election being over, these officers and soldiers will be sold and sacrificed on some forlorn hope, for our folly in not immediately petitioning for a stop to the further progress in raising a standing army. General Hamilton was married to the daughter of General Schuyler of New York, sister of Mrs. Church. Mrs. Church, then called Carter, was co-contractor in the late army, with Col. Woodsworth, both of whom made great fortunes by the war; and the son of Mrs. C. is about to marry the daughter of Mr. Bingham of Philadelphia, the Federal Senator. Thus are our advocates for war connected and allied together. Are our sons to fight battles that a certain class of men may reap the spoil, or enlarge their power and fortunes upon our destruction? Such, my fellow-citizens of Connecticut, are part of the facts which it is the duty of every man to present for your consideration, before you permit your sons to enter into wars, which may destroy both you and them. Scarcely removed from the distresses of one war—burdened with taxes—paying heavy charges to support your executive, legislative, judicial and ecclesiastical system, you are to be upon your guard. Your prisons are crowded—lawyers are severe and the clergy exact. Information is excluded from you, by fettered presses, and you cannot be too steadfast in the defence of your Government and Constitution which were earned with blood, and secured by wisdom. Who are to fight these battles? The exempts in our list, whose occupations in clerical and civil capacities excuse them from services, or those who, by rancor, have excited war on the part of the French Republic against the United States? Some want a war that the public may be diverted from our examination into their proceedings. Others to make fortunes upon the public spoil."

The court deemed the publication above recited, libellous, and under the second section of the act, commonly called the seditious law, passed the 4th July, 1798, which section is as follows, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That if any person shall write, print, utter or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered or published, or shall knowingly and wilfully assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering or publishing any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of the Congress of the United States, or of the President of the United States, with intent to defame the said Government, or either House of the said Congress, or the President, or to bring them or either of them into contempt or disrespect, or to excite against them, or either or any of them the hatred of the good people of the United States, &c. then such person being thereof convicted, before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years."

Upon this indictment, Charles Holt was convicted and sentenced by the court to be imprisoned for three months; to pay a fine of two hundred dollars, and the cost of the prosecution, taxed at twenty-nine dollars, and to stand committed until the fine and cost were paid, which were paid as appears by the exemplification of the record of the said trial and proceedings now on file in this House.

The committee are of opinion that the sum above recited was unconstitutional, null, and void, passed under a mistaken exercise of undelegated power; and that the mistake ought to be corrected by returning the fine so obtained, with interest thereon, to said petitioner. The committee do not deem it necessary to discuss at length the character of that law, or to assign all the reasons, however demonstrative, that have induced the conviction of its unconstitutionality. No question connected with the liberty of the press ever excited a more universal and intense interest—ever received so acute, able, long continued, and elaborate investigation—was ever more generally understood, or so conclusively settled by the concurring opinions of all parties after the heated political contest had passed away. All that remains now to be done by the Representatives of the people who condemned this act of their agents as unauthorized and transcending their grant of power, to place beyond question, doubt, or cavil, that mandate of the Constitution prohibiting Congress from abridging the liberty of the press, and, to discharge an honest, just, moral, and honorable obligation, is to refund from the Treasury the fine thus illegally and wrongfully obtained from one of their citizens; for which purpose the committee herewith report a bill.

The report was accompanied by a bill; which was read twice, committed to a Committee of the Whole, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of John Johnston, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

Defrees and Stephen Jermy, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for their relief, which was read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

from Lowsville, Madison county, Alabama, to Trenton, in Jackson county, same State.

And then, at a quarter past 5 p. m. the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, February 13, 1841.

After the journal had been read,

On motion of Mr. CLIFFORD, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair) for the purpose of considering, during the morning hour, the bill making appropriation for completing the survey of the Northeastern boundary of the United States.

It was discovered, however, that the bill had been sent to the printers, and that it could not be obtained in any reasonable time.

Mr. EASTMAN of New Hampshire hoped the committee would take up the bill recently introduced by him, extending for five years the act of 1838, granting half pay to certain widows and orphans.

Mr. PICKENS moved that the committee rise. The question was put, and the committee was counted by tellers—ayes 40, noes 81.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIR here decided that the rules were suspended for the special purpose of acting on a particular subject, and that it would not therefore be in order to take up any other matter.

A bill was here furnished by Mr. CUSHING, of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which he said was a copy of the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked the CHAIR if this were the identical bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CUSHING said he could answer.

Mr. DROMGOOLE would not receive his answer, and demanded that the CHAIR or Clerk respond to the inquiry whether the bill now presented was the identical bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk answered it was not.

Mr. CUSHING said it was a true copy.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called on the House not to act upon any bill which was not the bill actually reported to the House, and spoke as to the danger which might arise from the practice now proposed to be pursued by substituting a bill said to be a copy of the bill.

As the true bill could not be produced, another motion was made that the committee rise.

And the question being put, a quorum did not vote; upon which the committee rose and reported that fact.

The SPEAKER counted the House, and reported that a large quorum was present; and the House again resumed its session in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EVANS admitted that, according to a strict adherence to rule or form, the objections taken by Mr. DROMGOOLE were correct; but, in point of fact, the House in almost all cases acted upon bills which were only transcripts of the originals. It acted upon printed bills, the originals being filed away in the Clerk's office.

Mr. DROMGOOLE explained, and showed that the bills upon which the House usually acted were equal to the originals, as they were the official printed copies from the originals; the originals themselves, if any doubt arose, being not only within reach of, but in fact within the actual possession of, the House, and might be considered as actually before it.

The original bill still not being forthcoming—

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that the committee rise.

The question was taken by tellers, and there appeared—ayes 44, noes 82.

After remarks from several gentlemen as to the proper course of proceeding—

Mr. SMITH moved that the committee do proceed to act upon the bill substituted by Mr. CUSHING.

The question was put—Ayes 92, noes 50.

And so the committee determined to act on the bill handed in by Mr. CUSHING.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked if there was any mode by which it could be ascertained that the bill which the committee had voted to act upon was a true transcript of the original bill.

Mr. CUSHING thought it was too late to ask that question. The committee had decided to act upon the transcript handed in by him, copy or no copy. Mr. C. went on to explain the provisions of the bill, and stated that it was identical, in substance, with the original.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to amend the bill by reducing the appropriation from $75,000 to $37,500.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the amendment by striking out $37,500, and inserting $20,000.

Some discussion followed, directed mainly to the proper extent of the appropriation, in which Messrs. ALBERT SMITH, UNDERWOOD, CUSHING, HAWES, PETRIKIN, PICKENS, TILLINGHAM, and VANDERPOEL (the latter of whom suggested a compromise of $50,000) participated.

Mr. PROFFIT was proceeding to make some remarks, when, the hour having elapsed, the Chairman announced the fact; and the committee thereupon rose, (without action,) and reported progress.

BURNING OF THE CAROLINE AND THE CASE OF McLEOD.

Mr. PICKENS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made the following report, which was ordered to be printed:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the Message of the President, transmitting a correspondence with the British Minister in relation to the burning of the steamboat Caroline, and the demand made for the liberation of Mr. Alexander McLeod, respectfully report:

It appears that the steamboat "Caroline" was seized and destroyed in the month of December, 1837. The committee are induced to believe that the facts of the case are as follows: The boat was owned by, and in possession of, a citizen of New York. She was cleared from the City of Buffalo, and, on the morning of the 29th of December, 1837, she left the port of Buffalo, bound for Schlosser, upon the American side of the Niagara river, and within the territory of the United States. The original intention seemed to be, to run the boat between Buffalo and Schlosser, or, perhaps, from Black Rock dam to Schlosser, and, should it seem profitable, it was intended to run her also to Navy Island, and touch at Grand Island and Tonawanda. Her owner was Mr. Wells, said to be a respectable citizen of Buffalo, and it is obvious, his intention in putting up the boat was one of speculation and profit entirely. The excitement upon that portion of the frontier, at this period, had collected a great many in the neighborhood—some from curiosity—some from idleness—and others from taking an interest in the unusual and extraordinary collection of adventurous men gathered together at that time on Navy Island. Navy Island was "nominally" in the British "territory."

The owner of the Caroline took advantage of these circumstances to make some money with his boat, by running her, as a ferry boat, over to Navy Island. All these facts appear from testimony regularly taken, (see H. R. Doc. No. 302, page 46 and 39, 2d Session, 25 h Congress,) and the committee know of no legal evidence to contradict them. There is no proof that any arms or munitions of war were carried in the boat, except, perhaps, one small six pounder field-piece belonging to a passenger. The principal object was to run the boat as a ferry boat from Schlosser, on the American side, to Navy Island, on the British side. It is believed that, even in war, a neutral power has the right to trade in contraband articles, subject, of course, to seizure and confiscation, if taken within the jurisdiction of either of the contending parties. What is contraband of war is not always certain. Treaty stipulations frequently include some articles, and exclude others recognised in the law of nations. Trading in contraband articles is no excuse for invading the territory and soil of a neutral and independent power, whose private citizens may choose to run the hazards of such a trade. In this instance there were no two foreign powers engaged in war; but all concerned in the outbreak or excitement within the British jurisdiction, claimed to be British subjects, in resistance of the authorities of Canada, a province of the British empire. Even admitting, then, that the Caroline was engaged in contraband trade, yet it was with citizens who claimed to be subjects of the same empire with those who were styled the legitimate officers of the Province. Abstractly speaking, how was a private citizen to decide who were right and who wrong in these local disputes? And which portion of citizens of the same province must our citizens refuse to have any communication with? But the boat was merely used for one day as a ferry boat; and on the night of the day she commenced running, she was seized while moored at the wharf in Schlosser, and burnt. Several men were assassinated; certainly one, who fell dead upon the dock. Now the insinuation of the British Minister, that Schlosser was "nominally" within the territory of the United States, may well be retorted, as we can with equal truth say that Navy Island was "nominally" within the "territory" of the British Government; for at the period to which we allude, the people collected there had as effectually defied Canada authorities as any portion of our people had disregarded ours. Yet British authority thought proper to pass by Navy Island, then in its "nominal" territory, and in the plenitude of its power, to cast the axis of British jurisdiction over American soil. This was truly extending over us that kind guardianship which they had not the ability at that time to extend to a portion of their own territory, and which recommends itself to us, full as much from its assumption as from its love of right or law.

The British Minister is pleased also to call the Caroline a "piratical steamboat." The loose epithets of any one, no matter how high in place, cannot make that piracy which the law of nations does not recognise as such. Pirates are freebooters, enemies of the human race; and eminent jurists describe them as ravaging every sea and coast with no flag and no home. Piracy comes under the concurrent jurisdiction of all nations. Even in the worst point of view that it can be considered, those connected with the steamboat Caroline were but aiders and abettors of others engaged in rebellion. And the committee are totally at a loss to know upon what authority rebellion is recognised as piracy. Such confounding of terms is resting the case upon epithets, instead of sound law or facts. But even supposing it to be a "piratical boat," as the Minister asserts it to be; yet the moment it touched our soil it fell under our sovereignty, and no power on earth could rightfully invade it.

There is no doctrine more consecrated in English history, than that every human being who touches the soil of Great Britain is immediately covered by British law. Suppose one of her vessels were cut from the banks of the Thames and burnt by Frenchmen, and British citizens were assassinated at night, and the French Minister were to avow that they acted under the orders of his Government, and that the vessel was "piratical," and the citizens murdered were outlaws—then there is not an Englishman whose heart would not beat high to avenge the wrong, and vindicate the rights of his country. The law there is the law here. And there is no international law consistent with the separate independence of nations, that sanctions the pursuits of even pirates to murder and arson over the soil and jurisdiction of one of the States of this Confederacy. No greater wrong can be done to a country than invasion of soil. If it can be done with impunity at one point, and on one occasion, it can be done at another, and the nation that submits to it, finally sinks down into drivelling imbecility. If a representation of the state of things at Schlosser, and the conduct of those who had control of the Caroline, had first been made to the proper authorities of New York, or of the United States, then there would have been some show at least of respect for our sovereignty and independence, and a disposition to treat us as an equal. But in this case, as if to treat our authorities with contempt, there was no preliminary demand or representation made.

It was hoped that the outrage was perpetrated by a party in sudden heat and excitement, upon their own responsibility. But the British Minister now avows that "the act was the public act of persons obeying the constituted authorities of her Majesty's Province," and again affirms that "it was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities."

If this had been the first and only point of collision with Great Britain it might not have excited such interest, but there is an assumption in most of our intercourse with that great power, revolting to the pride and spirit of independence in a free people. If it be her desire to preserve peace, her true policy would be to do justice, and show that courtesy to equals which she has always demanded from others. The committee do not desire to press views on this part of the subject, particularly as a demand has been made by our Government upon the Government of Great Britain for explanation as to the outrage committed, the answer to which it is hoped will prove satisfactory.

As to the other points presented in the demand made by the British Minister for the "liberation" of Alexander McLeod, the committee believe the facts of the case to be, that the steamboat was seized and burnt as stated before, and that a citizen or citizens of New York were murdered in the affray. And there were reasons to induce a belief that McLeod was particeps criminis. He was at first arrested, and upon various testimony being taken, was then discharged. He was afterwards arrested a second time. Upon the evidence then presented, he was imprisoned to await his trial. There was no invasion of British territory to seize or take him. But upon his being voluntarily within our territory, he was arrested as any citizen of the United States, charged with a similar offence, might have been. We know of no law of nations that would exempt a man from arrest and imprisonment for offences charged to be committed against the "peace and dignity" of a State, because he is a subject of Great Britain, or because he committed the crime at the instigation or under the authority of British Provincial officers; much less do we know of any law that would justify the President to deliver him up without trial, at the demand and upon the assertion as to facts, of any agent of the British Government. If we had been at open war with Great Britain, and McLeod had committed the offences charged, then he might have fallen under the rules and regulations of war, and been treated as a prisoner of the United States Government, and would have been subject to the laws of nations in war. But as the alleged criminal acts, in which McLeod is charged to be implicated, were committed in profound peace, it is a crime, as far as he may be concerned, solely against the "peace and dignity" of the State of New York, and her criminal jurisdiction is complete and exclusive. If the crimes committed be such as to make a man hostis humani generis—an outlaw—a pirate, in the legal acceptance of the term, then under the law of nations, the United States courts and tribunals would have jurisdiction. But the offence charged in this case, committed as it was in time of peace, as far as this individual was concerned, was one purely against the lex loci, and coming exclusively within the criminal jurisdiction of the tribunals of New York.

The Minister, in his letter of the 13th December, 1840, says: "it is quite notorious that Mr. McLeod was not one of the party engaged in the destruction of the steamboat Caroline; and that the pretended charge upon which he has been imprisoned rests only upon the perjured testimony of certain Canadians, outlaws and their abettors," &c. This may perchance all be so; but it would be asking a great deal to require an American court to yield jurisdiction, and surrender up a prisoner charged with offences against the law, upon the mere ipse dixit of any man, no matter how high in authority. Whether McLeod be guilty or not guilty, is the very point upon which an American jury alone have a right to decide. Jurisdiction in State tribunals over criminal cases, and trial by a jury of the venue, are essential points in American jurisprudence. And it is a total misapprehension as to the nature of our system, to suppose that there is any right in the Federal Executive to arrest the verdict of the one, or thwart the jurisdiction of the other. If such a power existed, and were exercised, it would effectually overthrow, and upon a vital point, the separate sovereignty and independence of these States. The Federal Executive might be clothed with power to deliver up fugitives from justice for offences committed against a foreign State, but even then it might not be obligatory to do so, unless it were made matter of treaty stipulation. This duty and right in an Executive has generally been considered as dormant, until made binding by treaty arrangement. But when the matter is reversed, and demand is made, not of fugitives from justice for offences committed against a foreign power, but for the liberation of a man charged with offences against the peace and dignity of one of our own States, then it is, that the demand becomes preposterous in the extreme. The fact the offences were committed under the sanction of provincial authorities does not alter the case, unless we were in a state of war. In such cases as the present, the power to deliver up could not be conferred upon the Federal Executive by treaty stipulation. It could only be conferred in those cases over which jurisdiction is clearly delegated by the Federal Constitution. Such, for instance, as treason, which is an offence against the conjoined sovereignty of the States, as defined in the Constitution. Over all cases except those defined in the Constitution, and those coming clearly under the laws of nations, the States have exclusive jurisdiction, and the trial and punishment for offences against them, are incident to their separate sovereignty. It is not pretended in this case that there is any treaty stipulation under which the demand is made; and the Federal Executive, under our system, has no power but what is conferred by the Constitution, or by special law of Congress. In the former it is declared that "the Executive power is vested in a President of the United States," and that power is then to be pointed out and defined by special laws passed from time to time, imposing such duties as are thought proper and expedient by Congress.

Your committee deem it dangerous for the Executive to exercise any power over a subject-matter not conferred by treaty or by law; and to exercise it in any case in conflict with State jurisdiction, would be worse than dangerous; it would be usurpation.

But your committee forbear to press these points further at present, and they would not have said as much on such clear questions of international law, but that in this case, the demand for liberation has been made by the accredited agent of a great power, and under circumstances of peculiar aggravation and excitement.

We have other points of difference with Great Britain, which add interest to every question that arises between us at present. Neither our North-eastern or Northwestern boundaries are yet settled with her, and the subject is not entirely free from difficulty. She has recently seized our vessels and exercised a power involving the right of search, under the pretext of suppressing the foreign slave trade, which, if persevered in, will sweep our commerce from the coast of Africa, and which is incompatible with our rights as a maritime power. She has recently, in her intercourse with us, refused indemnity and denied our rights to property, on a subject-matter vital to near one half the States of this Confederacy, and which, considering her military position at Bermuda and her growing power in the West Indies, is of the last importance to our national independence.

All these subjects make every question between us, at this peculiar juncture, of the deepest interest.

Besides this, we are both permanently destined to have, perhaps, the most extensive commerce of modern nations. Our flags float side by side, over every sea, and bay, and inlet of the known globe.
